POLAND

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the United States, in a note delivered January 9 by Ambassador Arthur Bliss Lane in Warsaw, warns Poland that "the continuation of the present policy of suppression, coercion, and intimidation as applied to political opposition in Poland constitutes a violation of the letter as well as the spirit of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements."

The matter is of such significance that I ask that the full note of the Department be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the note was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have the honor to refer to the Embassy's notes of August 19 and November 22, 1946, regarding the Polish national elections, to which no reply has yet been received, and pursuant to instructions from my Government to inform Your Excellency, as a signatory of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements, with particular regard to those sections of the two agreements which deal with the establishment of a government in Poland, through the instrumentality of free and unfettered elections, of my Government's continued concern over the pre-election activities of the Polish Provisional Government of national unity.

My Government is especially perturbed by the increasingly frequent reports of repressive measures which the Polish Provisional Government has seen fit to employ against those democratic elements in Poland which have not alined themselves with the bloc parties.

It is a source of regret to my Government that its previous efforts to call the attention of the Polish Provisional Government to its failure to perform its obligations under the agreements cited have not resulted in any change in the course which that Government has pursued in connection with pre-election political activities.

According to information reaching my Government from various authoritative sources, these repressive activities on the part of the provisional government have now increased in intensity to the point where, if they do not cease immediately, there is little likelihood that elections can be held in accordance with the terms of the Potsdam Agreement which call for free and unfettered elections "on the basis of universal suffrage and secret ballot in which all democratic and anti-Nazi parties shall have the right to take part and put forward candidates."

SANCTITY OF PACTS AT ISSUE

It is the view of my Government that this matter involves the sanctity of international agreements, a principle upon which depends the establishment and maintenance of peace and the reign of justice under law.

The obligations with respect to the Polish elections which my Government assumed at Yalta and reiterated at Potsdam, together with the Soviet and British Governments, and the obligations subsequently assumed by the Polish Government and frequently reiterated, provide for the conduct of free and unfettered elections of the type and in the manner described above.

The fact that the subject matter of these agreements relates to elections in Poland is incidental. The essential fact is that they constitute an international agreement under which all four nations concerned have assumed obligations.

I need hardly say that my Government is interested only in seeing that the Polish people have the opportunity to participate in a free and unfettered election and that my Government does not regard the results of such an election as being a proper concern of anyone other than the Polish people themselves.

My Government would be failing in its duty if it did not again point out that the continuation of the present policy of suppression, coercion, and intimidation as applied to political opposition in Poland constitutes a violation of the letter as well as the spirit of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements.

STUDY OF PROBLEMS OF SMALL BUSINESS AND INVESTIGATION OF NATIONAL-DEFENSE PROGRAM—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, I report favorably without amendment the following resolutions:

S. Res. 20. A resolution appointing a special committee to study the problems of American small business; and

S. Res. 46. A resolution continuing the authority for the investigation of the national-defense program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, in connection with the two resolutions just reported, I want to point a moral.

The new Committee on Rules and Administration met yesterday, organized, became a going concern, and appointed subcommittees. There is a Joint Committee on the Library, which, under the Reorganization Act, must consist of four Senators from the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration and four members of the similar House committee. On the part of the Senate, Senators JENNER, IVES, GREEN, and HOLLAND were selected to serve on that joint committee.

On the Joint Committee on Printing the Senator from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS] will serve with the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] and myself.

On the Smithsonian Institution Subcommittee the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was appointed, with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

On a revision of the Senate rules there was appointed a subcommittee consisting of Senators WHERRY, IVES, and HAYDEN.

With reference to rooms, anyone who is interested in that subject either in the Capitol or the Senate Office Building should consult the chairman of the committee, since no subcommittee was appointed.

On the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, Senators HICKENLOOPER, BRICKER, and MYERS were selected, and all of the members present very properly decided that the Committee on Rules should assume the jurisdiction conferred upon it by law to take over all activities in relation to contested elections.

It will be understood that the Special Committee on Campaign Expenditures in the 1946 General Election, which continues in existence until the end of this month, was investigating the election in the State of Maryland. The Committee on Rules and Administration definitely determined that under the law that committee now had jurisdiction over all contested elections; that the committee would assert its jurisdiction and ask that the Maryland dispute be placed in its hands.

Then, toward the close of the meeting, much to the surprise of some of us, action was taken on the two resolutions which have been reported by the Senator from Illinois to create special committees of the Senate. They involve a very serious question of Senate policy. At the last session of Congress the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 became law. That act defines the jurisdiction of the 15 committees of the Senate. Now, at the beginning of the new Congress, there is a proposal to recreate the Committee on Small Business, and to continue the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program. Those of us who knew nothing about the resolutions and did not expect them to come up at the committee meeting requested they go over for a day or two, so that we might give consideration to the major problem of whether or not the Senate should at this time attempt to wreck the system of jurisdiction that had been imposed upon its various standing committees.

However, our request was very courteously but very firmly denied, and the majority of the committee decided to report the two resolutions immediately; they have been reported, and are now on the calendar. They can come up for consideration by the Senate on next Monday or any day thereafter. Since a principle is involved, I deem it to be my duty to bring this situation to the attention of the Senate. The very grave and serious question is whether the Senate shall now proceed to violate both the letter and the spirit of the act to reorganize the legislative branch of the Government, which became a law last August.

I have served for a long time in Congress. I have observed the operations of special committees both in the Senate and in the House. Many, though not all of them, have performed useful public service; but I am reminded in that connection of a remark made by the late Senator Claude Swanson, of Virginia, who was conducting an investigation in the Senate at one time. He said that an investigating committee was entitled to continue to investigate so long as it could stay on the front page, and that, his particular committee having been mentioned that morning on the fourth page of the newspapers, he thought it was high time that the investigation come to an end.

Publicity has its advantages. Members of the Senate all remember that a common or garden variety of Senator from the State of Missouri was made the chairman of an investigating committee to look into the national defense program, and that as the result he became the candidate of his party for and was elected Vice President of the United States. I would be loath to say that any Senators now entertain Vice Presidential ambitions, but it is an old American custom to erect rods that may attract the lightning which is bound to strike somewhere.

I want to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that coming over from the last Congress there are now in existence, and will be until the end of this month, the following special committees: The Committee To Study and Survey Small Business Enterprises; the Committee To Investigate Senatorial Campaign Expenditures in 1946 General Elections; the Committee on Problems Relating to the Development, Use, and Control of Atomic Energy; the Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program; the Committee on Petroleum Resources Within and Outside of the United States; the Committee on Postwar Economic Policy and Planning; the Committee Investigating the Effects of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934; the Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources; and the Committee To Investigate Production, Transportation, and Marketing of Wool.

Some of these special committees have been rendering very excellent service; for example, the Committee on Petroleum Resources Within and Outside of the United States and the Committee Investigating Production, Transportation, and Marketing of Wool. The work of both of those committees has been outstanding. If the Senate is now going to establish special committees, as is proposed in the two resolutions now on the calendar, then we must give serious consideration to the reestablishment of other special committees that were performing valuable functions.

I have inquired of the disbursing office and find that there are 14 subcommittees of regular standing committees which have money available for expenditures at the present time. That, of course, is the regular procedure that the Senate would follow under the existing rules. The nine special committees I have mentioned also have money that they can expend until the end of January. I ask unanimous consent to have the list of subcommittees placed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUBCOMMITTEES OF STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE

Committee on Agriculture and Forestry investigating the production and distribution of food and other allied products.

Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of obtaining and laying factual data and information before the committee for its consideration in the discharge of its functions.

Committee on Finance investigating old-age and survivors' insurance and all other aspects of social security.

Committee on Indian Affairs making a survey of Indian conditions.

Committee on Interstate Commerce investigating conditions of railroads in the hands of receivers because of insolvency proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act.

Committee on Interstate Commerce investigating international communications by wire and radio.

Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation investigating the supply and distribution of hydroelectric power.

Committee on the Judiciary investigating activities of Security and Exchange Commission and Post Office Department.

Committee on the Judiciary investigating the disposal of the Government's interest in the Nashville Tennesseean.

Committee on Military Affairs taking testimony concerning treatment accorded the population of the Philippines by the Japanese.

Committee on Military Affairs investigating war contracts.

Committee on Naval Affairs inspecting naval establishments in the Western Hemisphere.

Committee on Public Lands and Surveys investigating the administration of public lands.

Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs investigating economic conditions and war damage in the Philippines.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me repeat that by a unanimous vote the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration has decided to take over the jurisdiction imposed upon it by law with respect to contested elections. That was the regular, and entirely proper, thing to do. But it was decidedly irregular for that same committee, after having demanded that jurisdiction be taken away from the Special Committee To Investigate Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, 1946, and be deposited with it, to turn right around and report out two resolutions which create special committees. All I can say is that the jewel of consistency was not on exhibition in the Committee on Rules and Administration's showcase yesterday.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I should like to say that there is nothing new and there is no element of surprise connected with resolutions concerning the two committees mentioned in the resolutions reported by me. A distinction exists between the two committees and the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which was absorbed by the Committee on Rules and Administration.

There was a demand that the latter committee take over the functions the Committee on Privileges and Elections has always exercised when charges have been filed in election cases. We would have been derelict in our duty if we had not assumed that responsibility, and we did rightfully assume it.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. BROOKS. So far as continuing the two committees in question being a surprise, I will say that one of the committees has become such a household word in the Nation that most people still call the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program, the Truman committee, because of the distinguished President's work as a Senator on that committee. Congress appropriated $400,000,000,000 during the war, much of it behind the curtain of secrecy. Senators were not even privileged to ask questions on the record during those trying days. Much has been developed and disclosed by this committee under former Senator Truman, under former Senator Mead, and under the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], and now all that is proposed to be done is to thrash the question out on the floor and determine whether we are now again going to pull the curtain over things that have been done and have been looked into.

The same thing is true of the Special Committee To Study and Survey Problems of Small Business Enterprises. We do not ask for immediate consideration of the resolution affecting that committee. We think it is an important matter, and it will be thrashed out completely. The reason why I, as chairman of the Rules and Administration Committee, entertained the proposals with respect to the two special committees was that I thought it was so vitally important that the people know whether we are now going to look behind the curtain and see what happened to the money Congress appropriated for war purposes, and continue to investigate contracts that have been exposed and discussed recently on the floor of the Senate, and whether attempts will be made to block us from looking further into the subject.

Mr. President, I ask that the matter go over until Monday.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] suggested that the report made to the Senate by the committee of which the Senator from Illinois is the chairman lacks "the jewel of consistency." I suggest to the Senator that the exhibition of too much jewelry is vulgar.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I agree with the point of view expressed by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. Let me point out to the able Senator from Illinois that when the Truman committee was appointed, which had to do with investigating the conduct of the war, there were two separate Senate committees dealing with this subject, one having to do with the Navy Department and the other having to do with the Army, and therefore it was not feasible to have these committees of the Senate, separate as they were, conduct an over-all investigation.

That situation does not apply now. We have just set up a Committee on Armed Services, and if I may say so without immodesty, being a humble member of it, there is no abler committee in this body than the Committee on Armed Services, headed by the able Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY]. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is a member of that committee, and other Senators who are able and experienced are members of it. I can see no logic whatsoever in taking a function from this committee, on which we have lately conferred complete jurisdiction over the armed services, the conduct of war, and all things related thereto, and lodging it in the hands of a special committee of Senators who are not members of the Armed Services Committee, while at the same time taking the question of elections from a special committee, which was created by the Senate and which is halfway through its work, and transferring it to the Committee on Rules and Administration. The Senator from Arizona spoke of inconsistency. If that is consistent, then it is equally consistent that the Committee on Armed Services should look into all matters relating to the war. I am thoroughly in favor of the investigation in question. I will do nothing in the Armed Services Committee to block any investigation of matters relating to the conduct of the war. But that is the committee which should make the investigation. If Senators will look at the field of that committee's work, the scope of its activity, and consider the duties which are expressly outlined in the law which Congress recently passed, they will find that it is to consider all matters having to do with the conduct of the War Department and with the conduct of the Navy Department. That certainly means contracts to buy Army and Navy materials and other incidental matters. Here, as we start a new Congress, when we have recently passed a law reorganizing the Congress, the very first act of the Committee on Rules and Administration is to disorganize and attempt to reorganize the reorganized Congress all over again.

What is back of this movement? Does anyone question the ability, the standing, the knowledge, and the integrity of the able Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY]? I do not think so. I do not think there is an abler, a more judicious, and more patriotic Senator in this whole body.

Who are the other members of the Committee on Armed Services? The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] are the Republican members and the Democratic members are the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], and myself. Certainly the Republican members of this committee are outstanding men, both the older Members of this body and those who, as newcomers here, have made reputations which have preceded them into this Chamber. What on earth are we about to do except to take from one of the great committees of this body one of the very functions for which it was created? Is that being done in the name of public service, or in the name of greater efficiency? Not at all. If any Member of this body should desire an investigation of any phase of World War II, whether it be in the Army or Navy, or in any related activity, if he should submit a resolution and it should be sent to the Committee on Armed Services, we would assist in having it adopted, and the chairman would appoint an able subcommittee to conduct the investigation.

From the public viewpoint, the principal part of the reorganization bill was the salary increase to $15,000. In my humble judgment most of us would have been red in the face had we voted for a salary increase without a reorganization of the Congress, which had become antiquated because it was an old organization with expanding special committees, which had reached the point where Members received notices to attend three or four committee meetings at the same time, and obviously could not attend them all. So we reorganized; and every Member of this body knows that one of the reasons why many Senators voted for the bill, in order to justify the over-all act, was that of efficiency, and the disposition and division of duties of the various committees, aside from the salary increase.

Now we have no sooner met than we say nothing about the $5,000 salary increase, but we proceed to go off in all directions at the same time, with numerous special committees, which in my judgment is a direct reflection upon the membership of the standing committees whose reasonable right and duty it is to make certain investigations. I certainly hope that when this question comes up for a vote the able Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] who honors the Committee on Armed Services by acting as its chairman, will insist on his rights. I hope that Members on both sides of the aisle will sustain him, so that we may have the committees appointed by the Senate do the work of the Senate and the country, without having reflections continually cast upon the standing committees by having Senators who are for the most part unacquainted with many of the routine matters which come before such committees attempting to "barge" into their functions.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BREWSTER. I should like to know, first, what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is proceeding in the morning hour under the head of reports of committees.

Mr. BREWSTER. Has there been any motion to consider the continuing resolutions concerned with the special investigating committees to which reference has been made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No such motion has been made. The resolutions have been placed on the calendar.

Mr. BREWSTER. I understood the Senator from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS], as chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, to ask that the matter go over until Monday, in accordance with the understanding which was discussed in the Committee on Rules and Administration while I was present at the meeting yesterday. Is that correct?

Mr. BROOKS. I did not make any special request that the resolutions go over until Monday. They will automatically go over until Monday. They must lie over. No request has been made for immediate consideration, in order that Senators may have ample time to study the resolutions and prepare their speeches accordingly.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I shall not undertake to equal the eloquence of the Senator from Maryland, or to reply at this time to the gentle aspersions of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who, I am sure, on further reflection, will not desire, even in his very gentle manner, to question the motives of Members of this body. When we descend to that level we depart from all legislative deliberation. The Senator from Arizona gently suggested the fate which awaited a former chairman of a special committee. We might as appropriately—and I eschew the suggestion—suggest that the heated oratory from the other side might properly be attributed to some very ulterior motives; but that I do not suggest.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator does it by innuendo, and I am sorry he does. I made it a point not to do so, even by innuendo.

Mr. BREWSTER. I was referring to the statement of the Senator from Arizona, and not to anything the Senator from Maryland said. However, I did refer to the eloquence which the Senator from Maryland always exhibits. I do not withdraw that reference. I am sure that is no reflection upon the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. Does the Senator object to my reference to possible candidates for Vice President?

Mr. BREWSTER. I stated that the suggestion of the Senator, in the very gentle and lovely manner which is always characteristic of him, and other considerations of that character, which we are quite accustomed to hear from columnists and commentators, really had no proper place in this debate. I am sure the Senator will agree with me.

Mr. HAYDEN. I stated that I was loath to believe that any Senator now entertains Vice Presidential ambitions.

Mr. BREWSTER. However, the mere fact that the suggestion was made is significant. I would be loath to believe that the decision upon the other side arose from fear that further delinquencies of the administration might be exposed. I would certainly be loath to believe that; so we are on an equal footing.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I courteously point out to the Senator from Maine, who I feel has perhaps not given this matter his usual careful consideration, that in the report on the reorganization bill which I hold in my hand there are these two paragraphs, which I beg his leave to read to the Senate.

The first paragraph reads as follows:

A bill should be referred without regard to the author's service on any particular committee seeking jurisdiction when its subject matter does not normally lie in the defined province of that committee. In redefining the jurisdiction of committees, great care should be taken clearly to resolve existing conflicts by specifying which committee shall have jurisdiction.

The second paragraph—and I am taking only two paragraphs out of many, to show the philosophy of the bill—reads as follows:

Directing the regular standing committees to carry on this supervisory function appeals to your committee as a better method than the appointment of numerous select investigating committees when situations have grown so difficult as to arouse public demand for correction or special study. We recommend that the practice of creating special committees of investigation be abandoned.

It was that philosophy which remained clearly in my memory. It was expounded on this floor at the time the bill was passed and caused my earlier expression. It is that philosophy which I am sure impelled Members on both sides to give to the reorganization bill the standing which it had before the Congress and the country.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I am sure that the solicitude which has been expressed on the other side as to some possible infringement on the prerogatives of any Members on this side is duly appreciated.

It is interesting to note that this matter has already been discussed since reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules and Administration, in accordance with what had been deemed to be the policy that should be pursued by the majority. I am happy to assure the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, that not only I, but the members of the special committee, would be most happy to meet with members of the Committee on Armed Services in order to clear away any possible misunderstanding either as to jurisdiction or scope, and to consider what should be done in the transitional period in which we now are.

I have been one of the strongest believers in reorganization, and in the proper staffing of the standing committees, in order that they may perform their functions; but I trust we shall all understand that reorganization cannot be accomplished in a day. Time will be required both to secure the staffs and to complete the organization which is requisite. It had been my assumption, from earlier discussions, that it was thought possible that not only in the completion of the work which has been hitherto carried on by the special investigating committee, but in winding it up with the staff which we now have, which was created under my predecessors, there might well be, at least temporarily, a continuance of the special committee. I think that is the only thing that is contemplated in any proposal for the extension of the work. I anticipate that on Monday, when this matter will be in order for discussion, there will be ample opportunity for the discussion which its importance merits.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I have been very much alive to the possible controversy on the question which the resolution has brought forward. I have had numerous talks with committee members, which wound up this morning with a conversation with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], who very graciously quickly agreed not to take up the matter today, but to meet with our committee and his committee on Monday. At that time I am sure we shall be able to talk over the whole question and we will then be in position to give our views to the Senate on Monday if the subject is to be taken up at that time.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Is the presentation of a report debatable in the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I make that point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. Reports of committees are still in order.

INVESTIGATION OF PETROLEUM RESOURCES — REFERENCE OF RESOLUTION

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, on Wednesday, on behalf of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] and myself, I submitted a resolution, Senate Resolution 40, providing for the extension of the Special Committee To Investigate Petroleum Resources. It had been my expectation that that resolution would be referred, as these other two resolutions were referred, to the Committee on Rules and Administration; but I notice that it has been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which I believe to be an erroneous reference. I should like to have unanimous consent, since there has been no action on the resolution, that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and that it be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAYDEN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to point out that the rule of the Senate up to this time has been that no special investigating committee could be created unless a resolution had been reported by the appropriate standing committee of the Senate and then referred to the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The functions of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have been absorbed by the Committee on Rules and Administration. When the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] introduced his resolution on Wednesday he asked unanimous consent to have it referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and that is how that committee got it. In suggesting references, normally the Parliamentarian is perfectly right.

The resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska reads as follows:

Resolved, That paragraph (o) (1) (A) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by adding at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That any resolution proposing to establish or to continue a special or select committee, including a special or select joint committee, shall not be referred to any other standing committee of the Senate but shall be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration for consideration of all phases thereof, including the substantive matter."

Until the Senate adopts such a rule, under the rule of the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That is where it belongs. I object to its reference to the Committee on Rules and Administration until the Committee on Public Lands has considered it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

COMMITTEE JURISDICTION

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL. Under the Reorganization Act bill, in the absence of a special committee dealing with small business, which of the standing committees would have jurisdiction of small business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that pending a change in the rules such as has been proposed, such a question would go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Chair will read from subparagraph (d) of section 102 of the Reorganization Act:

> Committee on Banking and Currency, to consist of 13 Senators, to which committee shall be referred all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the following subjects:
> 1. Banking and currency generally.
> 2. Financial aid to commerce and industry.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PEPPER. I can well understand that small-business legislation might properly go to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am not a member of that committee nor a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; but I believe that under the Reorganization Act the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has jurisdiction of commerce generally. In view of the observation of the Chair, I respectfully submit that the Chair might consider the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that under the law the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is not given jurisdiction over commerce generally; it is given jurisdiction over interstate and foreign commerce generally.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Chair to paragraph 7, on page 7, of the Reorganization Act, under the heading "Committee on the Judiciary." It provides that that committee shall have jurisdiction of the "protection of trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

I understand that the real purpose of the Small Business Committee is to assure protection of small business against restraints and monopolies. So I think that the question hinges upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I merely wish to relieve the mind of the Senator from Arizona. A few moments ago he made reference to a prophecy as to the aspirations of men to the great positions of President and Vice President of the United States. In my judgment, so far as this side of the aisle is concerned, if any of our friends in the press gallery were bold enough to heave a stone on this side of the aisle, they could not fail to hit a man who is a candidate for President or Vice President.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In one of the local morning newspapers—I think on yesterday morning—there was an article which indicated that there were 48 candidates for Vice President or President on the other side of the aisle. I do not know whether that is correct or not, but it was worthy of a news story.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. While we are dealing with parliamentary inquiries—and there will probably be a number of them as a result of the Reorganization Act—I should like a ruling by the Chair upon the one I am about to make. I contemplate introducing legislation which will deal with portal-to-portal pay. I have in mind the definition of the workweek, the question of the statute of limitations, and other important matters that are involved in what seems to me to be probably the most urgent and important question which the Congress should first consider.

I base my parliamentary inquiry upon what happened the other day when I discovered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] had introduced Senate bill 49 to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, and for other purposes. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and, I think, properly so, after reading the contents of that measure.

On the same day the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] introduced Senate bill 70, to exempt employers from liability for portal-to-portal wages in certain cases, and for other purposes. For some unknown reason, that bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I have given study to the substance and the objective of both bills; in my humble opinion they are the same.

I raise this question because I should like to have any measures on this subject which I may introduce referred to the Labor and Public Welfare Committee. Of course, that, again, is a matter which is in the hands of the Chair; but I invite the attention of the Senate to the Reorganization Act, page 8, of Public Law 601, which I hold in my hand, which states specifically that the question of wages and hours of labor is a matter to be considered by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

I am satisfied that both measures to which I have referred deal with wages and hours, and all matters which are incidental and flow therefrom. It seems to me that now is the time to determine which of those committees is to have jurisdiction over the portal-to-portal pay question. I should like to know what the Chair will rule, so that I may be in a position either to follow the Chair's decision or to do something else, in the event that I introduce proposed legislation along this line.

The matter raises a very serious question. We should not have two committees handling this portal-to-portal issue. One bill is now before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, headed by the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]. Another bill on the same subject matter is before the Committee on the Judiciary, headed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY]. The latter bill was introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin; and, as I understand, the able Senator from Wisconsin requested that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary—the very thing, Mr. President, regarding which I made a point of order the other day, in connection with the question of the proper reference of bills to committees. I undertake to say that we cannot permit the persuasion of any individual Senator on the floor of the Senate to determine the committee to which a bill or other measure should be referred, and especially so now that we are operating under the terms of the Reorganization Act, which, in my opinion, takes away a great deal of discretionary power which heretofore has been given to the Chair in making decisions of this character. I think it is important to raise the point at this moment, and to determine where these measures should be referred.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, we further find ourselves in the position that the Committee on the Judiciary will begin hearings, as I understand, on Wednesday of next week, on the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin and was referred to that committee. The bill I introduced was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. Therefore, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 49, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, for the simple reason that, instead of having the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare hold hearings on portal-to-portal bills and the Judiciary Committee hold hearings on such bills, I think it is only fair that my bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, so that the bill may be considered by that committee together with the other bill which has been referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 49, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to make a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to know what is the position of the Chair with respect to the reference of proposed legislation of this character, and whether it is the position of the Chair that it should be referred to the Judiciary Committee or should be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. That is the point I raised and which is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, each bill has to be judged on its own terms and its own provisions. The opinion of the present occupant of the chair is that a bill which relates to wages and hours primarily and on its face, should be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. However, the Chair would have to examine the Senator's bill before committing himself on that point.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate that, and I wholeheartedly concur in the opinion of the Chair with respect to the reference of such measures to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

In view of the ruling of the Chair, I shall make objection to the request that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 49, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I base my inquiry on my belief that under the new rules the Senate should be careful not to make any decision which might be used as a precedent hereafter. If the bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin and the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana are similar in nature, how did it happen that one was referred to one committee and one to another committee?

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. When I sent my bill to the desk, I asked that it be referred to the appropriate committee. I did not ask that it be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare or to the Committee on the Judiciary, but I requested that it be referred to the appropriate committee. Later I found that the Chair had referred it to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. President, again I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that although beginning next week hearings are to be commenced before the Judiciary Committee on a portal-to-portal bill, and although one such bill is before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and another bill on the subject is before the Committee on the Judiciary, nevertheless, today I have been denied the right to have my bill referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, so that both bills might be considered by that committee at the same time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Chair will permit me to make a suggestion for the benefit of the Chair, if it is of any benefit, I should like to say that if a bill is incorrectly assigned or referred to a committee, the fact that that committee proceeds to hold hearings on the bill does not give it jurisdiction over the bill, if the bill was incorrectly assigned.

I do not know whether the two bills are identical or similar. But if the two bills are similar, it is a bad beginning here to have one referred to one committee and one referred to another committee. I do not believe that either committee should obtain jurisdiction by providing for the holding of an early hearing. If either of the bills has been incorrectly referred, that mistake should be corrected before we proceed too far into the maze of parliamentary differences and into the mesh of confusion by having similar bills referred to different committees.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Both bills amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, without reading the text of the bills, it would seem that both of them should have been referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Kentucky will suspend for a moment, the present occupant of the Chair is advised that the reason why the bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary was that he requested that that be done.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that raises the very question which has been a matter of great difficulty here in the past, and as to which I think the Senate as a whole and the Chair the other day announced ought not to be the rule which would control the reference of bills and other measures. In other words, I think Senators should refrain from undertaking to control the reference of measures to committees. I think that is the spirit of the new rules. I think that certainly is the spirit of the Senate. The Chair should not pay any attention to the personal request of any Senator, unless the request is that the bill be assigned or referred to the proper committee; and if it is to go to the proper committee, it should not be necessary for a Senator to request that it go there. It should go there under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the bill was referred.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that. But I think a new ruling of the Chair should be used as a precedent hereafter in determining a matter that is of some importance.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Kentucky will remember that I raised this very question one day earlier this week. I did so primarily because an individual Senator made a request from the floor that a bill which he was introducing be referred to a certain committee. In that case the Senator's request was a correct one, for the Chair did properly refer the bill to the committee to which the Senator requested that it be referred. But I know what has happened many times in the past when Senators were especially interested in particular bills which they wished to have referred to particular committees. Such requests have been made by Senators on both sides of the aisle, as the able Senator from Kentucky has said.

Under the Reorganization Act, if we are to start out by observing its spirit and letter, we cannot permit the practice to continue as we have in the past, for I undertake to say that the discretionary power which heretofore was lodged in the occupant of the chair has been taken away to a great extent, because in relation to each and every committee we can find, spelled out so that everyone can read, most of the information which it is necessary to have in order to determine exactly where a bill should be referred.

If we are to continue the practice we have followed in the past—and we have such a suggestion already—then we will have plenty of trouble in the Senate in connection with which committee should handle this or that measure, and the Senator who reaches the Chair first and says, "I want my bill referred to such and such committee," will determine the committee which will get the measure. That is wrong. Such a practice cannot be justified. Now is the time to stop it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, we all know that the custom which has been referred to grew up before the Reorganization Act was passed. I contended all along, in spite of the fact that the Senate rules did not very clearly define the jurisdiction of committees, that the Chair should exercise his own judgment in determining to which committee a bill should go, and in a case where he had any doubt about it and consulted the Parliamentarian, that the Parliamentarian should consider the subject matter of the bill in determining what advice he should give the Chair, and not be governed by the request of an individual Senator.

Those of us who served in the House of Representatives know that the jurisdiction of committees there is rather sharply defined, and there is not any confusion over the subject. Sometimes the Speaker may be in some doubt as to what committee a bill should be referred and consults the parliamentary clerk of the House, but I know of no custom that ever existed in the House that a bill should be referred to a particular committee because the Member introducing it asked that it be so referred, and it is not customary in the House to make such a request.

In the Reorganization Act we made an effort more sharply to define the jurisdiction of the committees, in order to get away from the long-time confusion which has existed, in order to get away from a sort of obiter dicta, ex cathedra announcement by a Presiding Officer then occupying the chair that he would refer any bill on any subject to any committee as requested by the author, which was utterly unjustified, in my judgment, and at that time I took the position that it was.

All I am seeking to do is to have it understood that the Chair shall exercise his judgment as to the committee to which a bill should go, depending upon its substance, and that he should not be governed by the fact that there is a request by a Senator that it should go to a particular committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, in keeping with the announcement by the President pro tempore at the beginning of the session relative to procedure during the morning hour, I submit to the Chair that the Senate is now out of order, that the regular order should be pursued. There is a time and a place when such motions as that we are considering should be made.

Inasmuch as we have entered upon this matter, I shall yield to the Senator from Indiana for a further statement, but I shall ask for the regular order after the Senator shall conclude. Then, if there is to be a discussion of any motion about proper reference of measures, we will take it up in the regular order.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] a question, if I may. I understand that hearings will start next week in the Committee on the Judiciary on the portal-to-portal bill.

Mr. WILEY. That is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. Let me ask a further question. Will it be possible for that committee to consider Senate bill 49, a bill introduced by me, which has to do with the question of portal-to-portal pay, without having it referred to his committee?

Mr. WILEY. If I may, I should like to make a brief statement in the Senator's time. I have listened to all the lecturing this morning——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that I must rise to a point of order. I ask that distinguished Senators withhold any further argument on the subject they have been discussing, and that we proceed with the morning hour. Then Senators can take their own time. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. Reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. WILEY. Is it in order to introduce bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

EXTENSION OF RETIREMENT BENEFITS TO SENATE OFFICIAL REPORTERS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended, so as to extend the benefits of such act to the Official Reporters of Debates in the Senate, and persons employed by them in connection with the performance of their duties as such reporters. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with a statement by me, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 125) to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended, so as to extend the benefits of such act to the Official Reporters of Debates in the Senate and persons employed by them in connection with the performance of their duties as such reporters, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Civil Service, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 (a) of the Civil Service Retirement Act approved May 29, 1930, as amended, is amended by adding at the end of such subsection the following:

"For the purposes of this act, the Official Reporters of the Proceedings and Debates of the Senate and persons employed by them in connection with the performance of their duties as such reporters shall be deemed to be officers or employees in or under the legislative branch of the Government, and service heretofore or hereafter rendered as an Official Reporter of Debates of the Senate or as a person employed by the Official Reporters of Debates of the Senate in connection with the performance of their duties as such reporters shall be deemed to be service as an officer or employee in or under the legislative branch of the Government. The provisions of this act shall not apply to any such Official Reporter or person employed by them until he gives notice in writing to the said Official Reporters of his desire to come within the purview of this act. In the case of any such Official Reporter or person employed by them who is in service on the date of enactment of this subsection, such notice of desire to come within the purview of this act must be given within 6 months after such date. In the case of any such Official Reporter or person employed by them who enters the service subsequent to the date of enactment of this subsection, such notice of desire to come within the purview of this act must be given within 6 months after the date of such entrance into the service. No provision of this or any other act relating to automatic separation from the service shall be applicable to any such Official Reporter or person employed by them."

The statement presented by Mr. WILEY to accompany the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY MR. WILEY ON REPORTERS' RETIREMENT BILL

The purpose of this bill is to fill a needless omission in the Civil Service Retirement Act. Because of that omission, Official Reporters of Debates in the Senate do not now have the benefits of the retirement provisions of the act. It seems to me, therefore, simple justice that these able and faithful men and those who work for them should have the benefits of the act.

No Member of this distinguished body can long be here without recognizing the invaluable services that are performed for him by the Official Reporters. With patience, with care, and with complete respect for their task, the Official Reporters chronicle each single word and action in this Chamber, editing senatorial remarks with precision, making suggestions, and otherwise helping to make an adequate and complete report for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They deserve this amendment at the very minimum.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES IN COMMEMORATION OF ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF ADMISSION OF WISCONSIN INTO THE UNION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of Wisconsin into the Union as a State. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with a statement by me, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 126) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of Wisconsin into the Union as a State, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of Wisconsin into the Union as a State, there shall be coined not to exceed 100,000 silver 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and composition, and of a special appropriate design to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for such coinage.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall bear the date of the year in which they are minted, shall be legal tender to the amount of their face value, and shall be issued only upon the request of a duly authorized representative of the State of Wisconsin, upon the payment by it of the par value of such coins. Such coins shall be issued in such numbers and at such times during the calendar year 1948 as shall be requested by such State of Wisconsin and may be disposed of at par or at a premium, and the net proceeds shall be used for the observance of the centennial as directed by the Governor of the State of Wisconsin.

SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for the security of the coins, or for any other purpose, whether such laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized.

The statement presented by Mr. WILEY was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY MR. WILEY

A COMMEMORATIVE COIN FOR WISCONSIN'S CENTENNIAL

The purpose and nature of this resolution are self-explanatory, and conform completely to legislation passed previously by Congress, for example, the measure passed in the Seventy-ninth Congress for coins commemorating Iowa's centennial.

The preparation of a special coin is but one of the ways by which I hope our Federal Government will appropriately recognize this noteworthy occasion in the life of the great Badger State. I have already written to Postmaster General Hannegan, urging immediate plans for the issuance of a special centennial stamp. I hope that by the prompt passage of the legislation which I am introducing, and the prompt preparation of the centennial stamp, we may lay the groundwork for the extensive plans that will be made by the appropriate authorities in Wisconsin for the commemoration of the centennial.

The importance of honoring and giving appropriate recognition to our States as entities and to our State governments cannot be underestimated in this day of centralization. Only by giving new dignity and prestige to the States can they be encouraged to solve their local problems at the grassroots level. I call attention to the fact that a special coin was struck to commemorate the centennial of Wisconsin's territorial government, and I believe that measures such as this are of help in promoting the prestige of our States.

BASIC SALARIES OF EMPLOYEES OF SENATORS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide flexibility in the schedule of basic salaries of employees of Senators. I ask unanimous consent that the bill and a statement which I have prepared be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 127) to provide flexibility in the schedule of basic salaries of employees of Senators, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the eighth paragraph under the heading "Clerical assistance to Senators" of the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1947, approved July 1, 1946, is amended to read as follows:

"Senators may change the number of employees in their respective offices, and may rearrange the schedule of basic salaries of such employees, including administrative assistants, in multiples of $5 per month: Provided, That such changes and rearrangements shall not increase the aggregate of the salaries provided for such offices by law or Senate resolution: Provided further, That no salary, other than that of the administrative assistant, shall be fixed under this paragraph at a rate in excess of $5,040 per annum, and no action shall be taken to reduce any salary which is specifically fixed by law at a rate higher than $5,040 per annum: Provided further, That Senators, before the day on which they are to become effective, shall certify in writing such changes or rearrangements to the disbursing office of the Senate which thereafter shall pay such employees in accordance with such certifications. Any sum available for the salaries of administrative assistants to Senators shall be available for payment of salaries of clerks in the case of any Senator in an amount equal to the difference, if any, between the basic salary of the administrative assistant and $8,000."

The statement presented by Mr. WILEY was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY MR. WILEY ON ADMINISTRATIVE ASSISTANT BILL

The purpose of this bill is to correct an inflexible feature in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act of 1947. Under that act, each Senator was given an administrative assistant whose basic salary is not to exceed $8,000. Further, under that act, if an employee is hired to fill that position at less than the top basic salary of $8,000, the difference between his salary and the $8,000 figure cannot be made available for other office purposes of the Senator.

At the time this feature was enacted I pointed out that in many senatorial offices Senators did not feel that employees hired to be administrative assistants, however capable, should be begun at the top basic salary of $8,000. On the contrary, I know that many of my colleagues are planning to hire men or have already done so at lower figures, such as $6,000. Under such a present arrangement, the $2,000 that is left over cannot be used by the Senator for office purposes. I need not remind each Senator that that sum might be properly used for apportionment, if only in part, among other members of the Senator's staff. I definitely do not believe that simply because a Senator has been granted this $8,000 job he should use the $8,000 in full merely in order to use up the money. On the contrary, I have stated that we must husband our funds here as much as we want the downtown agencies to husband their funds rather than to spend them recklessly, but innumerable senatorial offices would be benefitted, I humbly believe, if my amendment is passed in that each Senator will have available such additional sums to cover deserving needs in his office.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND SECURITY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and myself, I introduce a bill to create an executive department of the Government, to be known as the Department of Health, Education, and Security. At this time I desire only to observe that this bill is very similar to the one we introduced in the last Congress, known as S. 2503. I ask for its appropriate reference.

The bill (S. 140) to create an executive department of the Government to be known as the Department of Health, Education, and Security, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

TEMPORARY LABOR RELATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS], the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution to create a Temporary Labor Relations Commission to make a study and recommendations concerning labor relations.

I am introducing the joint resolution in order to carry out, in part, the President's recommendation in his state-of-the-Union message wherein he requests Congress to appoint such a Commission to investigate "the entire field of labor-management relations."

Mr. President, I have for a long time felt, and I publicly so stated as far back as April of last year, that the most intelligent approach leading to the most equitable and lasting solution of the labor-relations problem lies in a thorough and expert investigation of the whole problem, including, as the President suggested, "the underlying causes of labor-management disputes." In June of last year I specifically recommended a Presidential commission along the lines of the one established by President Wilson, which under the very able chairmanship of the late Frank P. Walsh, of Missouri, carried out such an enlightening and valuable investigation.

Mr. President, the sponsors of the joint resolution are in complete agreement with the President that Congress together with representatives of management, labor, and the public can carry out a more valuable and comprehensive study of the problem of labor-management relations than Congress by itself, or management, labor, and the public by themselves. The joint resolution, therefore, calls for the appointment of six Senators by the President of the Senate, six Members of the House by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and eight members of management, labor, and the public by the President of the United States.

The joint resolution gives particular emphasis to "the special and unique problem of Nation-wide strikes in essential industries affecting the public interest." The Commission in determining the underlying causes of labor-management disputes would be charged with investigating union and employer policies and practices, economic and other factors. The methods and procedures for carrying out the collective-bargaining process, Government policies, existing and proposed legislation, and measures designed to lessen or eliminate labor-management disputes would also be studied.

The Commission would also investigate the problem of the health and safety of workers and the feasibility of establishing welfare funds, as was suggested in the President's veto message on the Case bill last year.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) to create a Temporary Labor Relations Commission to make a study and recommendations concerning labor relations, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MURRAY (for himself, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. GREEN, Mr. MYERS, Mr. McGRATH, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. KILGORE) was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION RELATING TO FREEDOM TO WORK

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, for several years I have sponsored in the Senate a joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to restore to all citizens the freedom to work. At this time I send an identical joint resolution to the desk for proper reference, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 23) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, relative to freedom to work, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"FREEDOM TO WORK

"SECTION 1. No person shall be denied employment because of membership in or affiliation with or resignation from a labor union, or because of refusal to join or affiliate with a labor union; nor shall any corporation or individual or association of any kind enter into any contract, written or oral, to exclude from employment members of a labor union or persons who refuse to join a labor union, or because of resignation from a labor union; nor shall any person against his will be compelled to pay dues to any labor organization as a prerequisite to or condition of employment.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power and exercise it to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

TERMINATION OF PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES—AMENDMENT

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I send to the desk a copy of a bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, and for other purposes, and offer it as a substitute for Senate bill 70, to exempt employers from liability for portal-to-portal wages in certain cases, and for other purposes, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be appropriately referred.

Mr. HILL. Reserving the right to object, did I understand the Senator to ask unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Indiana to be offering an amendment as a substitute for a bill.

Mr. HILL. Did the Senator from Indiana ask that the amendment be referred to a particular committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator asked that it be referred to the committee which has before it the bill which his proposal is designed to amend.

Mr. CAPEHART. I asked unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF REPORT OF TEMPORARY NATIONAL ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

Mr. O'MAHONEY submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 2), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 1,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 35, Seventy-seventh Congress, first session, being the final report and recommendations of the Temporary National Economic Committee, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate Document Room and 500 copies for the use of the House Document Room.

SHORTAGE OF RAILROAD BOXCARS

Mr. REED submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 47), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Whereas there is presently available to shippers of traffic requiring boxcars approximately 700,000 cars of that type; a need for 800,000 cars is indicated; the result is a severe stringency in the supply of such cars in all sections of the country with consequent damage to shippers unable to receive cars adequate to their need; and

Whereas the rate of building new cars of all types is governed by the availability of necessary materials which has been and now is far below the needs of the commerce of the country; and

Whereas there are persistent claims that allotment of critical materials for building of freight cars has been below a justifiable minimum; and

Whereas the insufficient supply of boxcars produces a constant tendency to dislocate, as between railroads and as between sections of the country, the cars that are available with damage to business generally; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission has been given full powers to control the freight-car supply of the country (Interstate Commerce Act, sec. 1, pars. 13 to 17); and

Whereas it has been and is being vigorously asserted that the Interstate Commerce Commission has failed to use its power and authority to prevent or correct such dislocation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, or any duly constituted subcommittee thereof, of the Senate is authorized and directed to make an early and thorough investigation on the following points and to make prompt report to the Senate together with such recommendations as to necessary legislation as it may deem desirable:

A. Whether the boxcar supply of the railroads has been and is now adequate;

B. Whether there has been an avoidable failure to make necessary material available for the building of new cars;

C. Whether material for building of freight cars for export from the United States of America has been provided and such cars exported to the detriment of business in this country;

D. Whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has fully carried out the duties and obligations imposed upon that agency of the Congress by the Interstate Commerce Act.

CHARLOTTE D. WORDEN

Mr. MILLIKIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 48), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Charlotte D. Worden, widow of Floyd Worden, late an Official Reporter of Debates of the Senate, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

AMENDMENT OF RULE RELATING TO GERMANENESS OF AMENDMENTS

Mr. KNOWLAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 49), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Standing Rules of the Senate are amended by adding at the end thereof the following new rule:

"RULE XLI

"GERMANENESS

"No amendment to any bill or resolution pending in the Senate which is not germane or relevant to the subject matter contained in such bill or resolution shall be received or considered; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of any such bill or resolution be received or considered which does not directly relate thereto. All questions of germaneness or relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and decided without debate."

AMENDMENT OF RULE RELATING TO VOTES ON CERTAIN MEASURES

Mr. KNOWLAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 50), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That paragraph (3) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to a quorum for standing committees) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Any measure or recommendation reported from any such committee shall be accompanied by a report in writing, which shall be printed, and a record vote shall be taken on any such measure or recommendation and the names of those voting for and against the measure or recommendation shall be included in the committee report."

THE DOMESTIC SUGAR SUPPLY

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, I submit a resolution pertaining to the sugar situation in the United States, and I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a letter from a young housewife in my own home State of Connecticut pertaining to the sugar situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution (S. Res. 51), submitted by Mr. BALDWIN, was referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Whereas there exists in certain parts of the United States a shortage in the supply of sugar; and

Whereas this shortage is causing distress and suffering to people who are unable to obtain sugar to meet their minimum requirements; and

Whereas there would seem to be ample productive capacity in the United States, coupled with available foreign sources, from which to obtain a supply of sugar more than sufficient to meet all our needs: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of the sources of our domestic sugar supply, the amount of our present inventories, the reasons for existing shortages in sugar, and possible measures for alleviating such shortages; and to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation together with such recommendations as to necessary legislation as it may deem desirable.

The letter presented by Mr. BALDWIN is as follows:

LITCHFIELD, CONN., December 21, 1946.

Senator BALDWIN,

State House, Hartford, Conn.

DEAR SIR: I am writing to tell you about our sugar problem. I am a housewife, and we live on a farm in Litchfield County. We have five children. That means I have much cooking to do. My greatest problem since sugar rationing began is how to feed my family without sugar. Substitutes do not take the place of this hard-to-get article. Before rationing I always used from 5 to 10 pounds each week. In canning season much more.

We have done without our canned fruits, jams, jellies, without sugar for our table much of the time, and the pies, cakes, cookies, doughnuts, puddings, and candy have been out of the question.

Now, the war has been over for some time. Reports are that Europe's sugar crop is nearly normal. We want much more sugar in our American homes, where we are trying to raise the future generation of this country.

This year we faced Thanksgiving without sugar; now Christmas and the New Year without sugar, and it's not fair, especially to the children.

Thank you for listening.

Very truly yours,

INEZ I. MAY.

PROBLEMS OF AMERICAN SMALL-BUSINESS ENTERPRISES

Mr. MURRAY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 52), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditures under Senate Resolution 298, Seventy-sixth

Congress (providing for a study and survey of the problems of American small-business enterprises), agreed to October 8, 1940, as continued and supplemented, is hereby increased by $7,754.

EXTENSION AND INCREASE OF AUTHORIZATION OF SYNTHETIC FUELS ACT

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, earlier today I introduced a bill to amend the Synthetic Fuels Act by extending that act from 5 to 8 years and by increasing the authorization. I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point a statement which I have just dictated for release to persons interested.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXTENSION OF SYNTHETIC FUELS ACT AND DISPOSAL OF GOVERNMENT PIPE LINES

Unless the O'Mahoney-Randolph Synthetic Fuels Act of April 5, 1944, is amended, it may be impossible for the United States Bureau of Mines to proceed effectively with the originally planned program to make gasoline and other fuels from coal. I have, therefore, today introduced a bill extending the effective period of the act from 5 to 8 years, and the appropriation authorization from $30,000,000 to $60,000,000.

When the law was originally passed, it was contemplated that coal hydrogenation plants to demonstrate the utilization of coal as a source of liquid fuel should be constructed in several parts of the country close to the Nation's large deposits of coal. Rising costs due to the war and the fact that a government ordnance plant at Louisiana, Mo., was originally made available to the Department of the Interior prevented the construction of any of these coal plants.

On September 26, 1946, however, the War Department withdrew the Missouri ordnance works because it was found that it would be needed for the emergency production of ammonia for fertilizers. This effectively put an end to the coal hydrogenation plant, except for the research work which has been carried on in the Bureau of Mines laboratories, because the Interior Department does not now have sufficient funds available to proceed with the original plan.

Meanwhile, the consumption of petroleum in the United States is exceeding expectations. The conversion from the use of coal to the use of oil in many industries is increasing, as, for example, on the railroads where Diesel engines in large numbers are now supplanting steam locomotives.

If such conversions continue the coal industry may be seriously impaired, and many areas of the United States which depend upon coal mining may suffer.

Another fact which indicates the necessity for the amendment I have offered is that foreign sources of petroleum now greatly exceed domestic resources. The United States is no longer the world's greatest petroleum reservoir as it has been for 75 years until the war, and a sound conservation policy would indicate that there should be no interruption of the Bureau of Mines' program as originally contemplated in the O'Mahoney-Randolph Act to make a complete commercial demonstration of the possibility of making liquid fuel from coal.

The plan has the endorsement of the petroleum industry. The Independent Petroleum Association of America, for example, in its suggestions for a national oil policy, recommended that "research activities should be expanded and intensified in all fields, including the development of petroleum products from natural gas, coal, shale, and other sources of synthetics."

Supplementing my measure to continue the synthetic fuels program, I have, in conjunction with Senator CHAPMAN REVERCOMB, of West Virginia, introduced a resolution to postpone for 90 days the sale of the Big Inch and Little Big Inch pipe lines so that Congress may have an opportunity to study the effect of the disposition of these lines on all the fuel industries.

The report of the War Assets Administration recommends that the pipe lines be disposed of either for the transportation of petroleum or natural gas by sale to the purchaser "offering the greatest net return in dollars to the United States Government."

Personally, I have never believed that the greatest net return in dollars should be the only standard, and, as a matter of fact, the Surplus Property Act specifically set forth numerous other objectives which should guide the disposal of surplus property. Among these was the maintenance of competition, the encouragement of employment opportunities, and the avoidance of "dislocations of the domestic economy and of international economic relations." Moreover, it was specifically provided by Congress in the Surplus Property Act that "Government-owned transportation facilities and equipment" should be disposed of "in such manner as to promote an adequate and economical national transportation system."

The recently announced agreement among four large American companies operating in the Middle East for the distribution of Saudi-Arabian petroleum has given great concern to domestic petroleum producers in the United States lest it should mean a sharp increase of petroleum importations in such manner as to drive small producers out of business. It has been suggested, for example, that this agreement might lead to shifting the flow of Latin-American oil from its accustomed market in Europe to the United States.

The use of these pipe lines for gasoline was strenuously opposed at the joint hearings held in November 1945 by the Surplus Property Subcommitee of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs and the Special Senate Committee on Petroleum, by the railroads, the coal associations, and the mine workers. The hearings of the Senate Public Lands Committee on the original O'Mahoney-Randolph Synthetic Fuels Act developed the fact that natural gas is, next to crude petroleum, the best source of gasoline. The transportation of natural gas from the Southwest to the industrial areas of the East supplanting coal may be a very uneconomic use of a valuable natural resource when it is taken into account that the position of the United States as a producer of petroleum is deteriorating in comparison with the oil areas of the Eastern Hemisphere.

It would seem to me all of these subjects should be carefully examined by the appropriate congressional committees before the pipe lines are sold merely for cash without regard to the effect of such disposal upon the economic system of the country.

DISPOSAL OF LITTLE BIG INCH AND BIG INCH PIPE LINES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, earlier today I introduced two measures, one a joint resolution in which I acted on behalf of the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] and myself. The purpose of that joint resolution is to postpone for 90 days the disposal of the Big Inch and Little Big Inch pipe lines in order that the appropriate committees of Congress may consider the many issues which are involved in that matter. According to its report, the War Assets Administration would dispose of these pipe lines merely for cash to the highest bidder, without giving consideration at all to many of the very important objectives set forth in the Surplus Property Act, among which are the maintenance of competition, the preservation of domestic and foreign economic relations, the promotion of employment, and so forth. There was also an objective set forth in the Surplus Property Act that transportation facilities built by the Government during the war should be disposed of in a manner calculated to promote the best interests of the country.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR CONNALLY

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in connection with the initial reports submitted today from the reorganized Foreign Relations Committee I want to say a word for the RECORD regarding my predecessor in the chairmanship of this committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. The "bipartisanism" in foreign affairs of which we hear so much had its primary start in Chairman CONNALLY's committee, where my able friend from Texas, as always, has been wholly generous and scrupulously fair in his dealings with all his committee colleagues, entirely without regard to partisan lines. Furthermore, he developed a high committee morale and a high degree of committee efficiency by constantly bringing before us the key men of this and other countries for informal but highly significant interchanges of opinion. I am sure I speak for the entire committee when I express our thanks to him for his able, friendly, and effective leadership during critical and difficult days.

I should like to add, Mr. President, that I have been privileged to serve with the distinguished Senator from Texas in the intimate contacts of many international conferences along the road which we hope may lead to international peace and security. In every instance he has put his country greatly in his debt. At the recent meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations in New York, for example, he faced an unusually heavy accumulation of burdens because he represented us on the commission which was dealing with most of the white-hot political problems with which the General Assembly was confronted. He was called to long, arduous, delicate, and difficult labors, and he met all of these situations with relentless fidelity and constant success. He has richly earned our universal thanks.

The turn of the wheel, Mr. President, now calls me to the chairmanship so long and so well administered by my distinguished and able friend from Texas. I could not let the occasion pass without this expression of my affection and respect, and of my earnest hope that a united, unpartisan, American foreign policy may be the sole and exclusive dedication of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in the future as it has been in the past.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I wish to express my deep gratitude to the eminent Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] for his very kind and generous remarks. I shall not take the time of the Senate to make any extended remarks in reply, but I wish to say that I very greatly enjoyed my service as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I feel a profound sense of gratitude to all the Members on both sides of the aisle for their earnest cooperation and assistance. I am happy to have served with the Senator from Michigan, who has given such fine cooperation and made such an outstanding contribution in the various conferences in which we have taken part. I wish for him, as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the high degree of success which I am confident he will attain, and I am sure he will have the support of the members of the committee in the same degree accorded me, if not greater.

FEDERAL CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, this morning, all of us received a statement made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, to the United States Senate, with reference to Federal civilian personnel.

For 6 years I have had the pleasure of serving with the distinguished Senator from Virginia. Time and time again we have both loyally supported the proposition of reducing personnel in the departments and agencies that we felt had too many employees, and we have likewise joined in seeing to it that departments and agencies such as the Veterans' Administration received increases. Today I wish to thank the able, hard-working Senator from Virginia for again bringing this matter of Federal employment so forcibly to the attention of the Members of Congress and of the public at large by his release to the press.

I ask unanimous consent that at this point in my remarks the press release issued by the Senator from Virginia be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT MADE BY SENATOR HARRY BYRD, DEMOCRAT, OF VIRGINIA, CHAIRMAN, JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES, TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE WITH REFERENCE TO FEDERAL CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

During the month of November, 1946, Federal employment both inside and outside the United States dropped 111,006 from the October total of 2,441,473 to the November total of 2,330,467. Inside the United States employment dropped 101,475 from the October total of 2,125,469 to the November total of 2,023,994. Decreases in the War and Navy Departments totaled 40,325. Outside the United States employment dropped 9,531 from the October total of 316,004 to the November total of 306,473.

Largest increases occurred in the Veterans' Administration, which added 8,364 employees to bring their total to 221,760, and the War Assets Administration, which added 1,599 to bring their total to 58,922. Largest decreases were in the War Department, which dropped 46,651; the Post Office Department, which dropped 37,345; the Labor Department, which by following the direction of the Congress to return the United States Employment Service to the States, dropped 22,720; the Department of Agriculture, which dropped 6,516; the Navy Department which dropped 3,456; the Office of Price Administration, which dropped 2,706; the Interior Department, which dropped 1,312; and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which dropped 1,033.

The relief which the sorely pressed taxpayer might feel in reading such figures must be mitigated somewhat by two considerations which should be borne in mind. The first of these is that a portion of this decrease is found among seasonal and temporary employees, who quite possibly may be hired again at a later date. The second is that over-all employment, with the exception of the War and Navy Departments, is still considerably greater than it was on VJ-day. On August 31, 1945, Federal employment, excluding War and Navy but including that of 19 war agencies, stood at 1,117,456. On November 30, 1946, this same group of establishments totaled 1,296,397. In other words, the reductions which are now taking place are not reductions below our war-peak total; rather they are merely decreases which still leave the Federal Government, excluding the War and Navy Departments, with 178,941 more employees than it needed to beat Germany and Japan.

I have heard the argument that certain agencies, forced to curtail their normal peacetime activities because of the war, now need additional employees to handle the backlog of work, and also that the war and its aftermath have given the agencies additional responsibilities requiring more employees. Accepting this, let us examine Federal employment as of December 1939. At that time there were 706,700 Federal employees within the United States, not including those in the War Department and Navy Department. As of November 30, 1946, there were 1,240,378 such employees within the United States and 56,019 overseas; also, in December 1939 there were 222,136 civilian employees in the War and Navy Departments, while, as of November 1946, there are 783,616 civilians in the War and Navy Departments; nor does this include 250,454 civilian War and Navy Department employees overseas. Certainly these figures offer convincing proof that our Government is still needlessly overmanned; that our country is still needlessly overgoverned; that our taxpayers are still needlessly overburdened.

The new Congress, regardless of political affiliation, must not shirk the duty which the departments and agencies, by their failure to reduce to peacetime requirements, have forced upon it. At present the annual pay roll of the executive branch of the Government approximates $6,125,000,000. This is $1,500,000,000 more than the entire Government spent for all purposes in 1933. The executive branch now employs more people than all the State, city, and county governments of the entire 48 States. With the exception of school teachers, this includes, beside the regular State and municipal authorities, all the policemen, firemen, and public-service employees of the entire Nation. I call upon the Congress to correct this evil. If we are ever to balance the budget—to reduce the national debt—we must do it now, and we can't do it with 2,330,000 Federal employees.

Mr. LANGER. Under the Reorganization Act, the Committee on Civil Service, which consists of seven Republicans and six Democrats, has jurisdiction of "the status of officers and employees of the United States, including their compensation, classification, and retirement; also over the Federal Civil Service and the Postal Department generally." Immediately upon the convening of Congress we organized our committee as promptly as possible, and on Wednesday we introduced a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 41) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete study and investigation with a view to ascertaining (1) the number of officers and employees on the rolls of each department, independent establishment, or agency of the Government (including Government owned or controlled corporations); (2) whether the number of officers and employees on the rolls of each such department, establishment, agency, or corporation is adequate to enable it efficiently to perform its functions; and (3) whether the number of officers and employees on the rolls of any such department, establishment, agency, or corporation can be reduced without impairing its ability efficiently to perform its functions. The committee shall make a report (a copy of which shall be delivered to the Committee on Appropriations) to the Senate at the earliest practible date, together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate, during the Eightieth Congress, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to request such assistance and information from any departments and agencies of the Government, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report the educational material and data on such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per 100 words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, all Senators, including the distinguished Senator from Virginia, will be glad to know that, as chairman of the Senate Civil Service Committee, I have already had conferences with the Civil Service Commission. A hearing has been set for Tuesday morning, at which time we shall take up one department which we believe has far too many employees, whose number we think we shall be able to reduce very materially.

Mr. President, this matter has been discussed with the other members of the Committee on Civil Service, and we plan to bring before the committee the head of every department and agency of our Government. Under the Reorganization Act we shall report our findings promptly to the Senate Committee on Appropriations. It will be our earnest endeavor to consider each department as soon as we possibly can. If funds are needed to make a thorough investigation of excess employees all over the United States where these different departments operate, I take it the Senate will grant the necessary funds.

Immediately upon being appointed to the committee I discussed this matter with Mr. Hoover, of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and asked him for several investigators from that Bureau. I found, however, that it is not the policy of the Department of Justice, which has charge of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, to assign men to investigative work for any department of the Federal Government. Therefore, I shall confer with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], ranking Democratic member of the committee, and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], next ranking Democratic member, who is also a member of the Committee on Appropriations, in an endeavor to ascertain what investigations we shall need in order to rid the Government of excess employees, and to supplement those agencies which are understaffed.

So I wish to report to the Senate, so far as the release prepared by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] is concerned, that the matter has already had and is having very careful attention by the Civil Service Committee of the Senate.

DISCHARGE OF WAR-VETERAN EMPLOYEES OF THE SENATE

Mr. MCFARLAND. Mr. President, I feel that it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the letters which at the direction of the majority have been sent out discharging from the employ of the United States Senate men who are war veterans. I agree that it is within the province of the majority to send out such letters, but I also feel that in the case of veterans discharges should be made in accordance with the intent of the law.

Those of us who were in service in World War I will remember the promise that we would be given back our jobs when we returned from the service. We well remember that that promise was not lived up to. In the case of the last World War the Congress of the United States, in its judgment, saw fit to correct what occurred after the First World War. Paragraph (a) and paragraph (c) of section 8 of the Selective Service Act provide that employees of the Government of the United States who are in service may not be discharged from their jobs within 1 year after return from war service, and provide for the reemployment of such veterans if they make application for their old jobs within 90 days after their discharge.

Mr. President, I call attention to paragraph (b) of section 8 of the act, as follows:

> In the case of any such person who, in order to perform such training and service, has left or leaves a position, other than a temporary position, in the employ of any employer and who (1) receives such certificate, (2) is still qualified to perform the duties of such position, and (3) makes application for reemployment within 40 days—

That I understand has since been changed to 90 days—

> After he is relieved from such training and service—
> (A) if such position was in the employ of the United States Government, its Territories or possessions, or the District of Columbia, such person shall be restored to such position or to a position of like seniority, status, and pay.

Subparagraph (B) applies to private employment.

I call attention to the last sentence of paragraph (c) of section 8, reading as follows:

> And shall not be discharged from such position without cause within 1 year after such restoration.

Mr. President, some of the Senate employees who now are being discharged went into the service from their jobs here in the Capitol and fought for their country. Nobody asked them then whether they were Democrats or Republicans. They helped defend this country in its hour of need. Some have married, some have children, and they came back to their jobs here, attempting to supplement their income so that they can pursue their education. Now they find that all the promises made them are negated by the very people who wrote the law. It is going to leave a very bitter taste. I regret very much if the majority is going to carry politics this far. I hope they will reconsider their action in discharging these men. What can we expect of private employers if the Congress of the United States sets such ah example?

REPLETION OF SALMON FISHERIES THROUGH COOPERATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, earlier today the Senate had pointed out to it the great work done by the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the able Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] in bringing about international cooperation. I am sure that if such men as the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Texas continue their work we may finally achieve the goal of international cooperation for which we all hope.

Today I wish to call to the Senate's attention a matter of international cooperation which has actually occurred between this country and Canada. The great salmon runs of Puget Sound, the salmon fisheries being one of our large industries, were badly depleted from 1913 on. The mighty Fraser River, which flows wholly in Canada, dumps most of the salmon into the Puget Sound area. The industry is a joint one between the two countries. It was found that certain obstructions in that river were the cause of the great depletion of the salmon runs since 1913. Representatives of the two countries immediately got together, held such conferences as were necessary, and appointed a joint commission, which made a thorough study of the matter. Funds were jointly appropriated and the great canyon known as Hells Gate, in the Fraser River, through which the water flows 110 feet deep during the spring season, was widened, and the salmon runs of Puget Sound are now repleted because of the cooperation between and the friendly attitude of the two countries in this international economic problem.

Mr. President, to illustrate what can be done when two countries put their heads together for the great benefit of both peoples, I ask unanimous consent to introduce into the RECORD an article entitled "The Dramatic Conquest of Hells Gate." The solution of this economic problem affecting the great salmon runs of Puget Sound was brought about by international cooperation between Canada and the United States.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DRAMATIC CONQUEST OF HELLS GATE

(By Edward W. Allen)

Hells Gate—the conquering of the Hells Gate Canyon obstruction in the Fraser River, where at certain stages the ruthless sweep of turbid water completely frustrated the heroic efforts of struggling thousands of sockeye salmon to reach their spawning grounds to perpetuate their race—this marked a dramatic climax to the first 8-year epoch of the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission.

Two million dollars, half from Canada, half from the United States, were placed at the Commission's command to aid these salmon at Hells Gate and other places in the Fraser River system. The sum is substantial, but no more sought after, no more delicious, no more attractive food is to be found than canned up-river sockeye salmon. Dr. W. F. Thompson is world renowned for his work in the restoration of the Pacific coast halibut and is known to be ultraconservative in his statements, yet he computes that since 1911 (when rocks were dumped into the Fraser in the course of construction along the river and created disastrous obstructions to the salmon's ascent) the quantity of canned salmon which should have been but was not produced would, at recent OPA ceiling prices, have had a value of about half a billion dollars.

Some background knowledge is essential to an understanding of this, one of the greatest accomplishments in the history of fishery conservation.

Though it is of common knowledge to fishermen, many people do not know that Pacific coast salmon spawn in fresh-water lakes and streams, that the young spend some time in the fresh water, then go to sea until the spawning urge brings them back to the place of their birth, there to spawn and die.

About the time salmon approach fresh water on their spawning migration, they stop eating and deterioration sets in. Just before this process commences salmon have reached their greatest size, also the height of perfection in quality. It is then only that they should be caught. In the case of the sockeye salmon of British Columbia and the State of Washington, the usual period of a complete life cycle is 4 years.

Two facts, therefore, should be borne in mind. A sockeye will return to the stream where it was born; and in the Fraser this will ordinarily be in 4 years. It will be a part of a specific run of salmon, at a specific period of time, to a specific place.

A stream may have a run which enters the river in July. It may have another run which enters the river in September. Although runs overlap, these two runs to the same stream may be as independent as runs to different streams. Therefore to protect or build up a particular run to a particular stream in a particular year may be of no service to any other run to that stream, or to any other stream.

To illustrate one phase of the salmon problem in a different way: If a stream which has only one run each year is completely blocked off in any year, that stream will be barren every 4 years thereafter unless accidentally or artificially stocked. Even then it will require several 4-year periods before substantial production can be expected.

Another interesting feature as to the Fraser River sockeye, is that a particular spawning ground seems capable of producing a large run only every fourth year. The cycle of 1901, 1905, 1909, and 1913 had become known as the big years. The other years were "off" years.

The biggest pack of sockeye of all time was that of 1913, when almost 2,500,000 cases (a case being forty-eight 1-pound cans or the equivalent) were produced. In that year also the damage due to the dumping of rock into the river at Hells Gate Canyon reached its maximum. There has not been a big year since.

Attempts were made to remove the debris from the river, also to coordinate the fishery regulations on both sides of the boundary line, but it became recognized that only by joint international action could the once great sockeye industry be restored. In 1937 the present Commission was at last created.

The treaty confined the first 8 years' work of the Commission to investigation and the removal of obstructions. After that the Commission became charged with the additional function of regulation both for conservation purposes and to insure an approximately even division of the catch between the fishermen of the two Nations.

Investigation on a broad base was immediately undertaken. Eventually it centered upon Hells Gate as the outstanding culprit in obstructing restoration of the sockeye runs. It was found that the river had never been completely restored to its condition prior to the beginning of railroad construction. But it was also found that this rock canyon, even under natural conditions, had frequently taken heavy toll.

The entire upper Fraser River Basin, an area almost as large as the entire State of Oregon, debouches through this canyon, the gate of which at low water is only 110 feet wide. The river has the astounding normal seasonal variation in height at this point of 60 feet; in extreme years, 90 feet. It was definitely determined that at certain heights, particularly when the gage at the gate registered between 25 and 40 feet, that the river was practically impassable to salmon, that if such levels coincided with salmon runs and lasted long enough whole runs might be killed off, and that there was probably no run which had not suffered in some year or other.

Just as Dr. W. F. Thompson had been "borrowed" from the International Fisheries Commission to conduct the scientific investigation, so Milo C. Bell was now "borrowed" from the fisheries department of the State of Washington to grapple with the formidable task of conquering the Fraser. Mr. Bell, in consultation with Prof. C. W. Harris, of the University of Washington, and Prof. E. Pretious, of the University of British Columbia, and an able staff, built to scale on the University of Washington campus, a model of Hells Gate Canyon.

Experiments were conducted on this model resulting in the evolution of a wholly new design of structure for assisting the passage of fish up stream. The result was called a fishway and differs radically from the familiar ladder. Money and authorization were secured and, at a cost approaching a million dollars, a fishway was constructed on each side of Hells Gate. That on the northerly or right bank is a cement structure 220 feet long, 20 feet wide with vertical sides 45 feet high. It is divided lengthwise into 10 compartments separated from each other by vertical baffles rising the full height of the sides. These baffles are so designed as to break and spread the speed and drop of the water over the whole length of the structure instead of their being concentrated largely at one spot as on the natural river. The baffles are equally effective at any height of water in the fishway that is deep enough for fish.

The fishway on the left bank is similar to the other except that it is longer and that its upper end is narrower. Fishways of the same general character have also been built at Bridge River rapids farther up the Fraser. More, but smaller, fishways are under construction or in contemplation for several other places in the area where the passage of fish has been severely obstructed.

In 1941 water conditions at Hells Gate were so bad that a careful estimate indicated that the passage upstream of probably a million fish was absolutely blocked. In 1946 water conditions were believed to be as bad as in 1941, but the two fishways were in full operation and the bulk of the run passed through them, reaching the spawning grounds in excellent condition. However, on recommendation of its engineers, the Commission is extending its assistance to the fish to higher water levels than reached by the present fishways.

Much of the Commission's success is due to its exceptionally able experts—all of whom should be better known by those interested in fishery management. Dr. Thompson, Professors Harris and Pretious, and Chief Engineer Milo C. Bell have already been mentioned. The director is now B. M. Brennan, formerly director of the department of fisheries of the State of Washington, who resigned from the Commission to become its director. Dr. W. A. Clemens, as biological consultant, and Dr. H. C. Gunning, as geological consultant, have been generous in their assistance. The Commission feels very fortunate in having recently secured the services of Dr. Richard Van Cleve to head the biological staff. He was formerly with the International Fisheries Commission. At the time he accepted the Commission's invitation to become its chief biologist, he was chief of the bureau of marine fisheries of the California division of fish and game. All of these men have been ably assisted by competent and loyal members of the biological, engineering, and office staffs.

Under the treaty creating the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission, its work is limited to the rehabilitation of the sockeye salmon of the Fraser River, but it is confidently believed that the accomplishments of the Commission in the broad fields of fishery biology and fishery engineering will prove to be of inestimable value to other fisheries throughout the world. Moreover, this Commission and the International Fisheries Commission in its field of halibut, have nobly illustrated how two friendly nations can cooperate in practical ways to their mutual advantage.

THE DOMESTIC SUGAR SITUATION

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] today asked and received unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD a letter which apparently came from an irate housewife regarding the sugar situation. I appreciate that there is a scarcity of sugar, and I appreciate the concern with which all the people of the country view the situation respecting sugar. There is a great lack of sugar, but there are some justifiable reasons for the conditions which exist. The situation probably can be corrected and remedied to some extent. Probably many things can be done to increase the flow of sugar into this country and into other countries, but the reason for the situation and the facts behind it again involve matters of international politics and international cooperation and international agreement, so, for the benefit of many of us who probably are not so well versed as is the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and other Senators in the matter of foreign relations and as to certain commitments regarding this commodity so important not only to the United States but to the world at large, I wish to introduce into the RECORD an excellent editorial published in the Washington Post of this morning, which gives a remarkable analysis of the entire sugar situation.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wanted to suggest to the Senator from Washington that earlier today I had asked and received consent to have the editorial published in the RECORD.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Very well; Mr. President, I withdraw the request. I commend the Senator from New Mexico for feeling as I do respecting the contents of the editorial.

Mr. HATCH. It is an excellent editorial. I made no comment of my own at the time I offered it for the RECORD. I am very glad the Senator from Washington has spoken as he has.

REFERENCE OF BILLS RELATING TO PORTAL-TO-PORTAL PAY

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine propose to move that the Senate adjourn?

Mr. WHITE. I am about to move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Maine withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. WHITE. I am very glad to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to make one observation for the RECORD regarding the colloquy which occurred earlier today respecting the reference of bills dealing with the portal-to-portal problem. The President pro tempore was in the chair at the time the reference was made on Wednesday last. He was not in the chair earlier today when the colloquy in question occurred because he was on the floor waiting to be recognized in his capacity as the senior Senator from Michigan.

The Chair wishes to make this comment: It seemed to the Chair that the first portal-to-portal bill, which was introduced by the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], dealt almost exclusively with a legal remedy and with a statute which essentially involved a legal question rather than a public-welfare question, although it could be readily argued that both problems were intertwined and that either decision could have been justified. But it was because at that time the Chair thought the original bill predominantly involved a legalistic contemplation that it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Subsequent bills were referred automatically, without any particular consultation, to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare because they in turn seemed to be dominated by the labor and public-welfare factor rather than the legalistic factor.

However, the net result is obviously an impasse which ought not be allowed to stand. The Chair will ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the chairman of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to confer on this subject so that we may have a unified program. The Chair respectfully suggests that it is not quite so easy, as was indicated in the debate, always to find a clear-cut reference from the text of each bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I deeply appreciate what the Chair has said. I understand what the Chair will be up against under the Reorganization Act, in connection with a number of bills which will be introduced. However, when I saw in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what had happened and realized that one measure dealing with portal-to-portal pay had been referred to one committee and another such measure had been referred to a different committee, I then took it upon myself to read both bills. I also conferred with two very good lawyers on this subject. I will say to the majority leader, who seems to be interested in this discussion, that I do not pretend to keep up with law as I once did. I have been more or less out of active practice for a long time. However, I did confer with two good lawyers to find out whether or not they believed that these bills ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary or to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I also conferred with the Parliamentarian, and I gained the very distinct impression from all three of those gentlemen that in their opinion this problem dealt with wages and hours, and under the Reorganization Act dealing with that question there could be little doubt that the measures should go to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

I mention these facts only in an attempt to initiate our proceedings under the Reorganization Act in an orderly fashion, so that we may not set an erroneous precedent on this question which may arise to plague us later.

With all due deference—and I am always reluctant to disagree with the able Senator who now occupies the chair because I have great respect for his ability and judgment on all matters—I merely pass this suggestion along for whatever it is worth. After due consideration and study I believe that this important measure ought to go to the committee which the Parliamentarian and good lawyers say should handle it, notwithstanding the fact that it may have been referred to the wrong committee in the beginning. I repeat that I do this with a full sense of the weight of responsibility which the Reorganization Act places upon the United States Senate. I am completely "sold" upon the Reorganization Act, and I wish to do what I can to contribute in my limited way toward seeing that we get started right under this act, rather than starting on a wrong course which may cause trouble later. That was my only purpose in raising the parliamentary issue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair not only believes the able Senator from Illinois was wholly justified in raising the point, but also that it was very important that it should be raised.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Chair for those remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair adds this further indication of the difficulties involved in some of these situations: The title of the original bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] was "A bill to exempt employers from liability for portal-to-portal wages in certain cases." The title of the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] was "A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938." It was quite obvious that the latter belonged in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. It was not so obvious that the other bill belonged in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. In the view of the Chair, it belonged in the Committee on the Judiciary. There is a mixed jurisdiction involved, and we must straighten it out.

Mr. LUCAS. I can readily understand how, under those two captions, the Chair, in casually looking over the bills, should refer one to one committee and the other to another. But I seriously contend, upon a careful examination of each bill, that they both pursue the same objective, and they both belong in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair agrees with the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to read a portion of the report of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress, which bears directly upon this vital issue:

> The major objective or predominant character of a bill, in the opinion of the Presiding Officers of the Senate and the House, should be controlling in determining the reference of bills. We recommend the exercise of more care in the reference of Senate bills. A bill should be referred without regard to the author's service on any particular committee seeking jurisdiction when its subject matter does not normally lie in the defined province of that committee.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I am about to make a motion to adjourn until Monday, but I should like to make a brief statement before making the motion.

I feel that all Members of the Senate understand that in organizing a new Congress, creating committees, and introducing bills, as well as holding hearings before committees which ultimately report legislation to the Senate, there is an inevitable delay. I believe that at this time we are experiencing that which always happens at the opening of a new Congress. So far as I know, there is no further business immediately ready for Senate consideration. However, I am hopeful—and I think I may say I have the expectation—that in a very few days committees will be able to function, and proposed legislation will be before the Senate for consideration. I make that statement so that the country, as well as the Senate, may understand the situation which always confronts a new Congress.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I did not enter into the colloquy this morning relative to special committees, or the value of reports. I believe that in time the question which has arisen will be ironed out.

I respectfully invite the attention of the Chair, as well as other Senators, to the fact that regardless of reports, and regardless of the interpretation of those who wrote the reports, the reorganization bill stands for itself. The idea has been advanced by some Senators that what is in the reports, which have been written by Senators who are interested in this, that, or the other interpretation, is important. Let me say that what is in the reports is not the law itself. As we study the law and make our own interpretations, these questions will be ironed out satisfactorily.

With reference to special committees, of course if a Senator wishes to adopt the language of a report as his own interpretation, he has a perfect right to do so. I am not questioning that right. But here we have the question of special committees. I agree that as the reorganization bill passed the Senate at the last session it provided that there should be no more special committees. When the bill reached the floor of the House, that provision was eliminated. As the bill was finally passed and became law it still provided that special committees might be created if the Senate so desired. Their creation is not against the Reorganization Act which was passed by the Congress.

It is still a debatable question. We might debate all day as to what the report on the reorganization bill means and what was the purpose of those who drafted the bill. But when we get down to brass tacks, reports are not laws. We must take the law as it now is and do the very best we can to refer bills to committees which have jurisdiction of the subject matters involved in such bills. When it comes to the question of special committees we must decide what the policy will be, not as a party, but as the Senate of the United States.

I think my position is clear. I have gone along with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] many times in opposing special committees that were hurriedly organized, even to the extent of withholding appropriations because we felt that such committees were unnecessary. If it is to be the policy of the Senate that no special committees shall be organized, certainly I shall be glad to go along with that policy.

I believe I have had as much experience in the past 4 years with special committees as has any other Member of the Senate. I am just as anxious to eliminate them as is any other Senator. On the other hand, if it is to be the policy of the majority Members of the Senate to continue to organize special committees which cut across standing committee lines, I think we should develop the policy.

While I am on my feet, I wish to mention the fact that one Senator said that small business committee matters should be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. A distinguished Senator who has been a member of the Committee on Rules for many years, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], said that such matters ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. The ruling of the Chair was that if small business legislation were to be referred to a standing committee it should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

I submit that there are special committees which cut across standing committee lines. When they do, and the Senate feels that they are sufficiently important, I think we should organize such special committees and refer all proper subject matters to them.

I am not laying down a policy; I am simply stating again, as I stated in the debate on the reorganization bill, that special committees should be created only when there is need for them. Because of that fact I have submitted a resolution to amend rule XXV, which provides for the very thing that has been commented upon by Senators, that a bill or a resolution shall first be referred to the standing committee which has jurisdiction of the subject matter. Certainly we cannot have that rule and then give another committee power to judge whether or not an appropriation should be provided for a special committee. The resolution which I have offered proposing an amendment to rule XXV provides that where special committees are to be organized the Committee on Rules and Administration shall take jurisdiction of the subject matter, for the reason that that committee rises above the standing committee which has jurisdiction, and therefore it should consider not only the authorization for the special committee, but also the question of funds.

I hope that when the proposed amendment comes before us Senators will express their views, because I think this question is the meat of the whole situation. If we adopt the proposed amendment to the rule, it means that we may create special committees. If we do not, it means that the Senate will depart from the policy of the past of having special committees cutting across standing committee lines, and that we shall have no more special committees.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, it seems apparent that a bill of which I was the parent, a bill relating to portal-to-portal pay, which I introduced a few days ago, has precipitated considerable discussion. I think we have had sufficient lecturing on the subject. The distinguished Senator who recently spoke called attention to the fact that men's minds differ as to the proper committees to which certain bills should be referred. This particular bill, as the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], who is a member of my committee, said, involves simply a legal question. If there is any committee in the Senate which has jurisdiction of a legal question it is the Committee on the Judiciary.

When I introduced the bill I called the attention of the Parliamentarian to the fact that it involved simply a legal question, and it was referred to my committee. Someone must make the decisions. It is not the function of individual Senators to do so; it is the function of the Chair. He receives his direction and guidance from the Parliamentarian.

Yesterday the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], than whom there is no better lawyer in the Senate, agreed that our committee should have jurisdiction, and he agreed that the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] should be referred to our committee.

We are not here to squabble over delays or methods which occasion delays. Rather, we are here to accelerate and expedite the work of the Senate. The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is recognized as the proper committee to handle the over-all labor bill. There are various versions of it, including the so-called Ball-Taft bill, and other versions. The committee is going to work on that subject.

We recognize that one of the challenging issues before the American people today is the issue of whether or not the Supreme Court shall continue legislating, which it did in the Michigan case, which laid the basis for the portal-to-portal pay issue. We know that already suits involving approximately $3,000,000,000 have been commenced. That is a vital matter, because it affects not only individual industries but the whole economic structure of America. It is a reeducation, as some New Dealers would have it, which might make any future labor legislation unnecessary. If industry cannot provide jobs there will be no work.

So, Mr. President, I maintain that the President pro tempore, under the guiding hand of the Parliamentarian, exercised the proper function, and that he was correct. I have appointed a subcommittee, headed by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], who has been requested by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to start hearings not later than Wednesday next, with reference to the vital and challenging subject of portal-to-portal pay.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were rereferred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the following nominations:

Warren R. Austin, of Vermont, to be the representative of the United States of America to the United Nations with the rank and status of Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, and the representative of the United States in the Security Council of the United Nations;

CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND FRANCE RELATING TO TAXATION—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As in executive session, the Chair lays before the Senate Executive A, Eightieth Congress, first session, a convention between the United States of America and France, signed at Paris on October 18, 1946, for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of evasion in the case of taxes on estates and inheritances, and for the purpose of modifying and supplementing certain provisions of the convention between the two Governments relating to income taxation signed at Paris on July 25, 1939. Without objection, the injunction of secrecy will be removed from the convention and it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The convention is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the convention between the United States of America and France, signed at Paris on October 18, 1946, for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of evasion in the case of taxes on estates and inheritances, and for the purpose of modifying and supplementing certain provisions of the convention between the two Governments relating to income taxation signed at Paris on July 25, 1939.

I also transmit for the information of the Senate the report by the Secretary of State with respect to the convention.

The convention has the approval of the Department of State and the Treasury Department.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 10, 1947.

[Enclosures: 1. Report of the Secretary of State; 2. Convention of October 18, 1946, between the United States and France for the avoidance of double taxation.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 8, 1947.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, the convention between the United States of America and France, signed at Paris on October 18, 1946, for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of evasion in the case of taxes on estates and inheritances, and for the purpose of modifying and supplementing certain provisions of the convention between the two Governments relating to income taxation signed at Paris on July 25, 1939.

The Department of State and the Treasury Department collaborated in the negotiation of the convention of October 18, 1946, which was formulated as a result of technical discussions between representatives of this Government and representatives of the French Government. A public announcement regarding the negotiations was made by the Department of State, the announcement referring also to the fact that attention was given to certain current questions concerning the interpretation and administration of French taxes in their application to American nationals. The position of the French Government regarding such matters and regarding the application of certain provisions of the 1939 convention, pending the signature and coming into force of the proposed new convention, was made the subject of record in diplomatic notes, the texts of which were made public.

The new convention is in four parts, called titles. Title I (articles 1 to 6) contains substantive provisions for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to the United States estate tax and the French tax on inheritances. As in the cases of the existing conventions on this subject with Canada and the United Kingdom, the convention with France extends in its application, insofar as the United States is concerned, only to estate taxes imposed by the Federal Government. The imposition and collection of inheritance or estate taxes by States or Territories of the United States or by the District of Columbia are not restricted by the convention. As to France, the convention is applicable to the tax on inheritances, which corresponds with the Federal estate tax in the United States.

Title II (article 7) contains six lettered subparagraphs, each of which involves some modification or supplementation of provisions of the convention of July 25, 1939, now in force between the two countries, relating to income taxation.

Title III (articles 8 to 15) contains provisions relating to mutual administrative assistance through the exchange of information and for the collection of taxes in certain cases, with a view to discouraging tax evasion. Pursuant to article 16, upon the coming into force of the convention, the provisions of title III would apply with respect to taxes on estates or inheritances and also with respect to income taxes, the corresponding provisions of the 1939 convention being for that purpose superseded and replaced.

Title IV (articles 16 to 19) contains provisions relating to the procedure for bringing the convention into force and the procedure for terminating the convention.

The provisions relating to taxes on estates or inheritances are similar, in substantial respects, to provisions in the existing convention of June 8, 1944, between the United States and Canada and the existing convention of April 16, 1945, between the United States and the United Kingdom relating to taxes on the estates of deceased persons. As in the case of the convention with Canada and the convention with the United Kingdom, double taxation is avoided principally by means of a credit. The country imposing the tax in the case of a deceased person who, at the time of death, was domiciled in that country (or was a citizen thereof if that country be the United States) allows a credit for the tax imposed by the other country with respect to property situated in such other country and included by both countries for the purpose of computing the tax. A further credit is provided in the event that each of the two countries determines that the decedent was domiciled in its territory at the time of death. Other important provisions in title I are those relating to rules of situs of property, exemptions, and a provision that the country which imposes the tax solely on the basis of property situated therein shall not take into account, for determining the amount or rate of tax, property situated outside its territory. As in the convention with the United Kingdom, but unlike the convention with Canada, title I of the new convention with France contains no provision for the exemption of real or immovable property situated outside the taxing country. However, under the laws of both the United States and France such property is now exempt from tax on the estate or inheritance. France also exempts corporeal movables (tangible personal property) situated outside France.

The provisions of the convention which modify or supplement the 1939 convention with France are designed primarily to take into consideration certain changes in the laws or practices of one or the other of the two countries in regard to income taxation. Article 7, which constitutes title II of the convention, contains specific amendments to the 1939 convention, as set forth in six lettered subparagraphs, summarized as follows:

(a) The reference to the French national tax on undistributed profits as being among the taxes to which the 1939 convention relates is eliminated, in as much as that tax has been abolished.

(b) The first sentence is designed to embody in the convention with France the principle of article IX of the income-tax convention between the United States and the United Kingdom. The second sentence, whereby the term "royalties" shall be deemed to include rentals in respect of motion picture films, is consistent with article VIII (3) of the convention between the United States and the United Kingdom.

(c) This amendment has the effect of making article 8 of the 1939 convention reciprocal and has its origin in the desire of the French Government to be free to subject to its schedular taxation its own nationals who are employed by the United States Government in France. Under the 1939 convention France waived taxation of such individuals, although the United States reserved its right to tax United States citizens employed by the French Government in the United States.

(d) The amendments here provided are designed to accomplish more adequately the object of avoidance from double taxation. Under the 1939 convention France, in effect, allows a credit against its securities tax for 12 percent of the amount of income from securities derived by taxpayers in France from United States sources. At the time of the conclusion of the 1939 convention the United States tax generally imposed was at the rate of 10 percent upon such income. Since that time the rate of such tax has increased to 30 percent in the case of nonresident aliens and even higher rates where the income exceeds $15,400. Under these circumstances, the 12-percent credit allowed by France became inadequate to avoid double taxation. In recognition of this fact the French Government has agreed to raise the credit to 25 percent of the income taxes, effective retroactively to January 1, 1945, with respect to the taxation of income acquired since that date on which the French tax has not been collected. The second part of the subparagraph (d) would make applicable to aliens resident in France, including United States citizens, technical changes made in article 114 of the French Code on Direct Taxation. These changes do not involve any real departure with respect to the taxation of United States citizens in Frances. Like other aliens in the same situation, a United States citizen resident but not domiciled in France will continue to be taxed, insofar as the French general income tax is concerned, upon a sum equal to five times the rental value of the residence or residences maintained by such citizen in France. This basis is deemed to be as favorable to the taxpayer as can be reasonably expected.

(e) The new article 17A here set forth will have the effect of permitting American business in France a further opportunity to obtain the benefits which were accorded by article 17 of the 1939 convention.

(f) This amendment merely changes the designations of the respective officials of the two countries who shall be deemed to be the "competent authority" or "competent authorities" for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the 1939 convention. In this respect, the 1939 convention is made consistent with the corresponding provisions in tax conventions of the United States with other countries.

Title III, relating to administrative cooperation, corresponds with title II of the 1939 convention and supersedes that title II insofar as the provisions of title III of the new convention may be applicable to income taxation. This is designed primarily to achieve uniformity, as far as possible, in the provisions for administrative cooperation in respect of both estate taxation and income taxation. The provisions of title III are substantially similar to provisions on the same subject in the tax conventions which have entered into force recently between the United States and Canada and the United Kingdom. There are the usual safeguards that the provisions do not impose upon either country the obligation to carry out measures contrary to the regulations and practice of either country or to supply information not procurable under its legislation, as well as other safeguards found in corresponding provisions of other tax conventions of the United States. The changes which are effected in relation to the 1939 convention are considered desirable in the interest of a more efficient fiscal cooperation between the revenue services of the two countries.

It is anticipated that in the course of consideration of the convention by the Senate the appropriate officials of the Treasury Department will be called upon to furnish, and will furnish, a more detailed statement with respect to the purpose and application of the substantive provisions of the convention, including those relating to exchange of information and assistance in collection.

Article 17 is similar to article XXII of the income-tax convention between the United States and the United Kingdom, in that it lays the basis for application of the convention to colonies, overseas territories, protectorates, or territories under mandate or trusteeship. Article 17 does not of itself extend the provisions of the convention to such colonies or other territories, but makes it possible, in the case of French colonies or other territories which have tax systems closely analogous to that existing in France, for the convention to be extended in its application without the necessity for entering into a separate convention covering each of the colonies or other territories. This, of course, will be possible only on the conditions specified in article 17. As pointed out in connection with the submission to the Senate of the income-tax convention with the United Kingdom, the United States revenue laws do not extend to overseas possessions, such as Puerto Rico. Such possessions will be free to elect, under article 17, to have the conventions with France extended in application to them, subject to the requirement for the giving of a notification to that effect by the United States Government to the French Government and the right of the latter to give notice that it does not accept such notification. Adequate provision is made also with respect to the termination of the convention as to any of the colonies or other territories to which it may have become applicable under article 17.

Article 18 provides for ratification and for the exchange of instruments of ratification and prescribes the effective dates of the convention. As to title I and other provisions of the convention applicable with respect to taxes on estates and inheritances, the convention will enter into force on the day of the exchange of instruments of ratification and shall be applicable solely to estates or inheritances in the case of persons who die on or after that date. As to title II and other provisions of the convention applicable with respect to taxes on income, the convention will (except as otherwise provided for special purposes, as in articles 7 and 17) enter into force on the 1st day of January following the exchange of instruments of ratification.

It is provided in article 19 that the convention shall remain in force for a minimum period of 5 years, but may be terminated by the giving of written notice by one of the contracting countries to the other contracting country, according to the procedure and with the effect specified in that article.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES F. BYRNES.

Article 4

The Contracting State which imposes tax in the case of a decedent who, at the time of his death, was not domiciled in its territory but was domiciled in the territory of the other Contracting State:

(a) shall allow every abatement, exemption, deduction, or credit, which would be applicable under its law if the decedent had been domiciled in its territory, in an amount not less than the proportion thereof which the value of the property, situated according to Article 3 in such State and subject to the tax of such State, bears to the value of the property which would have been subject to the tax of such State if the decedent had been domiciled in its territory; and

(b) shall (except for the purpose of subparagraph (a) of this Article and for the purpose of any other proportionate allowance otherwise provided) take no account of property situated according to Article 3 outside its territory in determining the amount or rate of tax.

(b) outside of both territories.

The total of the credits authorized by this paragraph shall be equal to the amount of tax imposed with respect to such property by the State imposing the smaller tax, and shall be divided between the two States in proportion to the amount of tax imposed by each of the two Contracting States with respect to such property.

(3) For the purposes of this article, the amount of the tax of each Contracting State attributable to any designated property shall be ascertained after taking into account any applicable abatement, credit, remittance, diminution, or increase, as provided by its law, other than any credit authorized by this article.

(1) Any claim for a credit or a refund of tax founded on the provisions of this Title shall be made within a period of five years from the date of the death of the decedent.

(2) Any such refund shall be made without payment of interest on the amount so refunded.

TITLE II. TAX ON INCOMES

The provisions of the convention and protocol between the United States of America and the French Republic signed at Paris on July 25, 1939, are hereby modified and supplemented as follows:

(a) In the enumeration of French taxes to which the convention of July 25, 1939, applies the reference to the national tax on undistributed profits which is set forth as number (3) in Article 1 (b) of Title I is eliminated as the tax has ceased to be imposed in France since January 1, 1941. The second paragraph of Article 15 of said convention is abrogated.

(b) For the purposes of Article 7 an individual resident of France deriving from sources within the United States rents from real property, or royalties in respect to mines, quarries, or other natural resources may elect for any taxable year to be subject to United States tax as if such resident were engaged in trade or business within the United States through a permanent establishment therein in such taxable year. For the purposes of Article 7 the term "royalties" as used in the second paragraph of such article shall, as to amounts paid on or after January 1, 1945, be deemed to include rentals in respect of motion picture films.

(c) Article 8 is amended by adding after the words "other State" in the first paragraph thereof the following:

"(other than citizens of such other State").

(d) (1) Article 14, B, a) is amended by striking out "12" and inserting in lieu thereof "25". This subparagraph shall be deemed to be effective as of January 1, 1945, with respect to the taxation of income acquired since that date on which the French tax has not been collected.

(2) The last paragraph of Article 14, B, b) is abrogated and replaced by the following provisions:

"However, the provisions of the first and second paragraphs of Article 114 of the French Code on direct taxation relative to the taxation of aliens domiciled or resident in France shall continue to be applied."

(e) By adding immediately after Article 17 the following new Article:

"Article 17A

"The American corporations affected by Article 17 of the Convention of July 25, 1939, which remain subject to the provisions of Article 3 of the Decree of December 6, 1872, which were not placed under the special regime established by Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention for the avoidance of double taxation between the United States of America and France signed April 27, 1932, may, during a new period of six months from the date of exchange of the instruments of ratification of the present Convention, exercise with reference to past years the option provided in those two Articles under the conditions which they prescribe."

(f) Paragraph VIII of the Protocol is amended to read as follows:

"VIII.

"As used in this Convention, the term 'competent authority' or 'competent authorities' means, in the case of the United States of America the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or his duly authorized representative, and in the case of France the Chef du Service de la Coordination des Administrations Financieres or his duly authorized representative."

TITLE III. ADMINISTRATIVE ASSISTANCE

Article 8

(1) With a view to a more effective imposition of the taxes referred to in Title I of the present Convention and in the Tax Convention of July 25, 1939, and to the prevention of fraud in the case of such taxes, the Contracting States agree that their competent authorities will exchange all the information which they possess or can procure under their respective laws that may be of use to the competent authorities for these purposes. The information transmitted under the provisions of this Convention by one of the Contracting States to the other Contracting State shall not be published, revealed or disclosed to any person except to the extent permitted under the laws of the latter State with respect to similar information.

(2) In no case shall the provisions of this Title relating to disclosure of information in particular cases or to mutual assistance in the collection of taxes be construed so as to impose upon either of the Contracting States the obligation to carry out administrative measures at variance with the regulations and practice of either Contracting State or to supply particulars which are not procurable under its own legislation or information which is of such nature that it would involve violation of an industrial, business, or trade secret or compromise its security.

(3) The State to which application is made for information or assistance shall comply as soon as possible with the request addressed to it. If, for any of the reasons set forth above, it is unable to comply with such request it shall inform as soon as possible the State making the application.

(b) As regards—

(A) a decedent who was a citizen of, or domiciled in, the United States, any information disclosed by United States estate tax records relative to property of such decedent situated in France; and

(B) a decedent domiciled in France, any information disclosed by United States estate tax records relative to property of such decedent situated in the United States.

(c) Any particulars which the competent authorities of the United States may obtain from banks, savings banks or other similar institutions concerning assets belonging to individuals whose addresses are in France or to French corporations or other entities, as well as information on the amount of payments of coupons from securities which are made to the account of these persons.

(d) Any particulars which the competent authorities of the United States may obtain from inventories in the case of property passing on death concerning debts contracted with individuals whose addresses are in France or French corporations or other entities.

(2) The information referred to in subparagraph (a) of paragraph (1) of this Article will be transmitted as soon as possible after December 31 of each year. The information referred to in subparagraphs (b), (c) and (d) of paragraph (1) of this Article will be transmitted as soon as practicable in the course of audit of estate tax cases.

Article 10

(1) In conformity with the provisions of Article 8, and independently of the enumeration below, the competent authorities of the French Republic will transmit spontaneously to the competent authorities of the United States information which they can obtain on the existence of property belonging to the estates of persons, domiciled at the moment of their death either in France or in the United States or of citizens of the United States, and which may be taxable under the estate tax laws of the United States.

(2) They will furnish in particular to these authorities:

(a) the copy of the transcript of the report of the opening of safety boxes or sections of safety boxes which were rented by the decedents or their spouses if these persons were domiciled in the United States or if they were citizens thereof;

(c) the copy of the lists of securities, cash or documents of evidences of value belonging to the estate of a person domiciled in the United States transmitted by corporations or companies, brokers, bankers, ministerial officers (notaries), business agents, custodians;

(d) the report of the opening of each individual or joint account opened with one of the persons designated under the preceding subparagraph and concerning one or more citizens of the United States.

(3) They will also furnish to these authorities:

(a) the name and address of each natural or juridical person having an address in the United States and drawing from sources situated in France income from immovables, dividends, interests, royalties, salaries, wages, bonuses, pensions, annuities, or other periodical (fixed or variable) incomes, accompanied by an indication for each of the said persons of the amount of this income;

(b) all information which they can obtain from banks, savings banks or other analogous institutions on assets belonging to persons who have an address in the United States or corporations or other United States juridical persons as well as information on the amount of payments of coupons from securities which are made to the account of these persons;

(c) all information which they can obtain from inventories at death concerning debts which are due to persons residing in the United States or corporations or other United States juridical persons.

(4) The information referred to in paragraph (2) and subparagraph (c) of paragraph (3) above will be transmitted as quickly as possible and as soon as it comes to the attention of the competent authorities of the French Republic; the information referred to under subparagraphs (a) and (b) of paragraph (3), as quickly as possible in the first six months of each year.

The competent authorities of each of the Contracting States shall be entitled to obtain from the competent authorities of the other Contracting State information concerning concrete cases affecting natural or juridical persons as far as the application of the taxes referred to under Title I of the present Convention and the taxes under the tax Convention signed July 25, 1939, is concerned.

Article 12

(1) The two Contracting States undertake to lend assistance and support to each other in the collection of the taxes to which the present Convention or the Convention of July 25, 1939, relates, together with interest, costs, and additions to the taxes and fines not being of a penal character according to the laws of the State requested, in the cases where the taxes are definitively due according to the laws of the State making the application.

(2) In the case of an application for enforcement of taxes, revenue claims of each of the Contracting States which have been finally determined will be accepted for enforcement by the State to which application is made and collected in that State in accordance with the laws applicable to the enforcement and collection of its own taxes.

(3) The application will be accompanied by such documents as are required by the laws of the State making the application, to establish that the taxes have been finally determined.

(4) If the revenue claim has not been finally determined, the State to which application is made will take such measures of conservancy (including measures with respect to transfer of property of nonresident aliens) as are authorized by its laws for the enforcement of its own taxes.

Article 13

(1) The competent authorities of the two Contracting States may prescribe regulations necessary to interpret and carry out the provisions of the present Convention and the Convention of July 25, 1939. With respect to those provisions relating to exchange of information and mutual assistance in the collection of taxes, such authorities may, by common agreement, prescribe rules concerning matters of procedure, forms of application and replies thereto, conversion of currencies, transfer of sums collected, minimum amounts subject to collection, payment of costs of collection, and related matters.

(2) Should any difficulty or doubt arise as to the interpretation or application of the present Convention or the Convention of July 25, 1939, or their relationship to Conventions between one of the Contracting States and any other State, the competent authorities of the Contracting States may settle the question by mutual agreement.

Any taxpayer who shows proof that the action of the revenue authorities of the Contracting States has resulted in double taxation in this case in respect of any of the taxes to which the present Convention, or the present Convention, or the Convention of July 25, 1939, relates, shall be entitled to lodge a claim with the State of which he is a citizen or, if the taxpayer is a corporation or other entity, with the State in which it is created or organized. Should the claim be upheld, the competent authority of each State may come to an agreement with the competent authority of the other State with a view to equitable avoidance of the double taxation in question.

Article 15

As used in the present Convention, the term "competent authorities" means, in the case of United States of America, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or his duly authorized representative, and, in the case of the French Republic, the Chef du Service de la Coordination des Administrations Financières or his duly authorized representative.

TITLE IV. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 16

Upon the coming into force of the present Convention, the provisions of Articles 20 to 26, inclusive, constituting Title II, of the Convention between the United States of America and the French Republic, signed at Paris on July 25, 1939, shall be superseded and replaced by the provisions of Articles 8 to 15, inclusive, constituting Title III, of the present Convention to the extent that such provisions may be applicable with respect to the taxes which are the subject of the Convention of July 25, 1939.

Article 17

(1) So long as the present Convention shall be in force, either of the Contracting States may, by written notification to the other Contracting State through diplomatic channels, declare its desire that the operation of either

(a) Title 1, and other provisions of the present Convention which may be applicable with respect to the taxes which are the subject of Title I, or

(b) the Convention of July 25, 1939, as modified and supplemented by the present Convention, or both, shall extend to all or any of its colonies, overseas territories, protectorates, or territories under its mandate or trusteeship which impose taxes substantially similar to those which are the subject of Title I of the present Convention or which are the subject of the Convention of July 25, 1939, as the case may be.

(2) The provisions of the present Convention, or of the Convention of July 25, 1939, as modified and supplemented by the present Convention, with respect to which a notification is given in accordance with paragraph (1) of this Article, shall apply to the territory or territories named in such notification,

(a) as to the taxes which are the subject of Title I of the present Convention: in the case of persons who die on or after the date or dates specified in the notification (it being understood that such date or dates shall be not less than sixty days from the date of the notification), or, if no date is specified in respect of any such territory, on or after the date of such notification, or,

(b) as to the taxes which are the subject of the Convention of July 25, 1939: on and after the first day of January following the date of the notification (it being understood that such first day of January shall be not less than sixty days from the date of the notification), unless, before the date on which the provisions would otherwise be applicable to a particular territory, the Contracting State to which the notification is given shall have informed the other Contracting State, in writing through diplomatic channels, that it does not accept such notification in respect of that territory. In the absence of such an extension, the provisions which are the subject of the notification shall not apply to any such territory.

(3) At any time after the expiration of a period of one year from the effective date of an extension made by virtue of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article, either of the Contracting States may, by a written notice of termination given to the other Contracting State through diplomatic channels, terminate the application of the provisions to any of the territories of the former State to which such provisions have been extended; in which case,

(a) in so far as concerns estates or inheritances in the case of persons who die on or after the date or dates specified in such notice (it being understood that such date or dates shall be not less than sixty days from the date of such notice), or, if no date is specified, on or after the sixtieth day after the date of such notice, or

(b) in so far as concerns the application of the Convention of July 25, 1939, as modified and supplemented by the present Convention, on and after the first day of January following the date of such notice (it being understood that such first day of January shall be not less than sixty days from the date of the notice), the provisions, as the case may be, shall cease to be applicable to the territory or territories named in such notice; provided, however, that this shall not affect the continued application of such provisions to the United States, to France, or to any other territory to which such provisions apply and which is not named in the notice of termination.

(4) For the application of any of the provisions to any territory to which it is extended by the United States or by the French Republic, references to "United States" or, as the case may be, "France" or to the territory of one (or of the other) Contracting State, shall be construed to refer to the territory to which such provisions shall have been extended.

(5) For the purposes of the present Convention, Algeria shall be considered to be a French territory to which the provisions of this Article shall apply.

(1) The present Convention shall be ratified and the instruments of ratification shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

(2) The provisions of Title I, and the other provisions of the present Convention in so far as they may be applicable with respect to the taxes which are the subject of Title I, shall enter into force on the day of the exchange of instruments of ratification, and shall be applicable solely to estates or inheritances in the case of persons who die on or after that date.

(3) The provisions of Title II, and the other provisions of the present Convention in so far as they may be applicable with respect to the taxes which are the subject of the Convention of July 25, 1939, and of Title II of the present Convention, shall, except as otherwise provided in the present Convention, enter into force on the first day of January following the exchange of instruments of ratification.

(1) The present Convention shall remain in force for a minimum period of five years after the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

(2) If, not less than six months before the expiration of such period of five years, neither of the Contracting States shall have given to the other Contracting State, through diplomatic channels, written notice of its intention to terminate the present Convention, the Convention shall remain in force after such period of five years until either of the Contracting States shall have given notice of such intention, in which event

(a) the provisions of Title I, and the other provisions of the present Convention in so far as they may be applicable with respect to the taxes which are the subject of Title I, shall not be effective as to estates or inheritances in the case of persons who die on or after the date (not being earlier than the sixtieth day after the date of the notice of termination) specified in such notice, or, if no date is specified, on or after the sixtieth day after the date of such notice; and

(b) the provisions of Title II, and the other provisions of the present Convention in so far as they may be applicable with respect to the taxes which are the subject of the Convention of July 25, 1939, and of Title II of the present Convention, shall not be effective on or after the first day of January following the expiration of a six-month period after the date of the notice of termination.

In testimony whereof the Plenipotentiaries above-named have signed the present Convention and affixed thereto their seals.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 10, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Through Thee, our Heavenly Father, we rise to the great realities of our existence and know ourselves as the sons of God. Thus the things of earth are seen in their true proportion. Do Thou keep us awake and alive to our possibilities for service to raise the whole ideal of the well-being of the Republic. I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. In the blessed name of our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, it would be a very great accommodation to the Members if they knew what might be the program for next week, if any?

Mr. HALLECK. I am in agreement with the gentleman from Texas as to the desirability of Members knowing something about what the program will be next week because it is to be hoped that committee assignments will shortly be announced.

There will be the matter of the organization of committees; and if other Members are in the same position I am, they would like to have a day or two to try to get caught up with their correspondence. It is hoped that our Committee on Committees can complete its labors and make its recommendations Monday morning. We then hope to be in position to have a conference Monday afternoon for approval of our committee assignments and that those committee assignments will be ready for presentation to the House on Tuesday. It is my idea for next week, there being no legislation yet, of course, to come before us, that we might meet Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday, and then go over to the following Monday. I have discussed this with the minority leader and I understand it meets with his approval.

Mr. RAYBURN. I thank the gentleman.

BUDGET MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. 19)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting the Budget for the fiscal year 1948. It includes recommendations for the entire Federal program.

Expenditures under existing and proposed legislation are estimated at 37.5 billion dollars and revenues under existing tax laws at 37.7 billion dollars, leaving a very slight margin of surplus.

I strongly recommend that the Congress take early action to continue throughout the fiscal year 1948 the war excise-tax rates, which, under the present law, will expire July 1, 1947. My declaration of the end of hostilities on December 31, 1946, was not issued in order to achieve tax reduction. I considered it essential that war excise-tax rates be retained, but I also considered it necessary to terminate the "state of hostilities" as soon as it became possible to do so.

I also recommend that the Congress increase postal rates sufficiently to wipe out the postal deficit.

These recommendations would reduce expenditures to 37.1 billion dollars and increase revenues to 38.9 billion dollars. We would then have a budget surplus of 1.8 billion dollars.

As long as business, employment, and national income continue high we should maintain tax revenues at levels that will not only meet current expenditures but also leave a surplus for retirement of the public debt. There is no justification now for tax reduction. At today's level of economic activity, our present revenue system will not yield so much in 1948 as in the current year. We shall no longer collect large sums from the excess-profits tax, and sales of surplus property will decline.

Revenue estimates are, of course, to a very large extent determined by the level of business activity. In this Budget, it has been assumed that, with minor fluctuations, business activity will average slightly higher than in the calendar year 1946. A recession in business would cause tax yields to drop. In addition, the cost of supporting agricultural prices and payments to unemployed veterans would increase. Should such a recession occur, it would be a temporary slump growing out of transition period difficulties and would call for no revision in our budget policy.

For the fiscal year 1947 it now appears that receipts will amount to 40.2 billion dollars and expenditures to 42.5 billion dollars. The 1-billion-dollar increase in expenditures over the August estimate occurred largely in veterans' programs. For example, many more veterans than had been expected decided to go to college or enroll for job training. We cannot regret this demand for education, but it illustrates the kind of uncertainty that cannot be eliminated in preparing our estimates.

The deficit for the current fiscal year would have been larger if executive action had not been taken to place expenditure ceilings on some activities and to hold them well below the amounts available under appropriations already made. The way the various departments and agencies of the Government, particularly the War and Navy Departments, have succeeded in cutting their expenditures is gratifying. Although public works could not be cut so deeply as anticipated in August without causing a wasteful stoppage of work already under way, we shall still show a substantial saving in this fiscal year for these programs.

This Budget meets our basic requirements for Federal programs at home and abroad for the fiscal year 1948. The Federal Government must not only fulfill its contractual obligations; it must also provide the services that are necessary for the welfare and the progress of the Nation. We have to carry our proper share of the expense of building world organization. We must make effective provision for national defense.

We have many other commitments, both international and domestic, that must be honored. In fact, a very large part of all our expenditures in the fiscal year 1948 will be required to meet commitments already made. The Budget is designed to meet these needs and to execute every program with strict economy.

The reconversion of wartime military and civilian services was far advanced during the calendar year 1946. Of 26 emergency war agencies in operation shortly before VJ-day, only 5 remain, and 3 of these are winding up their work. Two others—the War Assets Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls—have been added to help close out the war program. The 1948 Budget assumes a reduction of civilian employment in the Government as a whole to less than three-fifths of the wartime peak number—in addition to the heavy shrinkage of the armed forces.

The Government has been exerting every effort in the wake of the war demobilization to strengthen and make more efficient its internal organization and administrative methods. It is essential that citizens receive maximum service for their tax dollars, and the administration plans further intensive measures to improve the administrative practices, organization, and efficiency of the departments and agencies.

But the cost of peacetime services has risen strikingly as compared to these costs before the war. Prewar figures can no longer be used as a yardstick. Although Government wages have not been raised so much as private wages, the cost of supplies has risen in line with the cost of goods in private markets. Further, the population to be served has grown since 1939 by 10 million people, adding proportionately to the demand for many public services. Many normal maintenance items had to be postponed on account of the war, and cannot be further neglected. Normal services which were cut during the war have to be restored.

Let me now review the expenditure side of the Budget, taking first the large items which practically determine the size of the total.

1. Interest on the national debt will be 5 billion dollars. This is an obligation that must be met.

2. Refunds due under the tax laws are estimated at 2.1 billion dollars. These are fixed obligations under present law.

These two items total 7.1 billion dollars.

3. National defense is estimated at more than 11.2 billion dollars, almost all for the operating expenses of the Army and Navy. Though we expect the United Nations to move successfully toward world security, any cut in our present estimate for 1948 would immediately weaken our international position. This large part of the Budget, in my judgment, represents a proper balance between security and economy.

The total so far is 18.3 billion dollars.

4. International affairs and finance will call for 3.5 billion dollars, a sharp reduction from the 6.4 billion dollars required in the fiscal year 1947. We still have contractual commitments to make good in connection with our loan agreement with the United Kingdom and under the reconstruction lending program of the Export-Import Bank. We must discharge our occupation responsibilities in Europe and the Far East. We must provide for war damage restoration in the Philippines and for the relief and resettlement of displaced people of Europe. We must continue to give relief to some other countries which are most urgently in need.

The work of the United Nations and the specialized organizations associated with it is of the highest importance. We must not fail in our support. The Department of State, for which increased appropriations are requested, must be prepared to carry an increasing load of work in the growing field of American foreign relations.

Our international affairs budget is important for peace, security, and our own prosperity. To reduce it would delay the restoration of a peaceful and prosperous world.

The total of these four items is 21.8 billion dollars.

5. Veterans' services and benefits will cost more than 7.3 billion dollars. This country has provided generously for the successful return of veterans to civilian life and for the care of the disabled. While the cost looms large in the Budget, much of it goes to provide education and rehabilitation which will add to our national strength and prosperity. The cost for veterans' education, pensions, and hospitals will increase in the fiscal year 1948; but if employment remains high, the unemployment payments should be smaller. Veterans' benefits under present law appear to be adequate.

These five items—interest, refunds, national defense, international affairs, and veterans—require expenditures of 29.2 billion dollars, or almost four-fifths of the total Budget.

6. Programs for regulation and improvement of the transportation and communications systems and for development of natural resources will amount to 2.6 billion dollars. The largest single item is 443 million dollars for the Atomic Energy Commission. Our major effort now must be to exploit to the full the peacetime uses of this great discovery.

About 1.2 billion dollars of the expenditures on these two programs is for public works construction, and much of the rest is for the promotion of our merchant marine and other aids to transportation.

The expenditure for the Federal-aid program for highways rests on the Federal Government's agreements with the States. Air transport will be seriously retarded unless new air-navigation facilities are promptly supplied. River basin development and harbor improvement cannot be neglected without impairing efficiency in private enterprise. Most of the public construction projects are already under way. A few additional projects, not yet started, have been provided for in 1947 appropriations.

Public construction in these and other fields contributes to the productive capacity and taxpaying ability of the country. The postponement of public works in good times and their expansion in hard times will make their contribution even greater. All postponable public works should be deferred at the present time. But the need to protect and improve our natural resources has become acute as a result of the war, and we must carry out the works included in this Budget if we are to avoid waste.

7. Our agricultural program will amount to 1.4 billion dollars. This includes the price supports guaranteed by law, the conservation of farm land, and our investments in rural electrification. In addition, the Department of Agriculture will continue its program to promote research in agriculture and better marketing methods.

This brings the total to 33.2 billion dollars.

8. The Budget programs for social welfare, health, and security, and for education and general research amount to 1.7 billion dollars. This total excludes unemployment compensation and old-age and survivors insurance, which are financed through trust-account operations that do not appear in Budget expenditures. It does include 481 million dollars in payments to the railroad retirement trust fund. More than half of the remaining expenditures is for aid to the aged and other dependent persons. The rest is largely for protection of public health, for crime control, and for grants to States for vocational education.

9. The Federal housing program is estimated at 539 million dollars. The bulk of the housing expenditures is for purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of guaranteed home loans to veterans and for continued operation of revenue-producing war housing in overcrowded communities.

Our social-security program and our education and housing programs can hardly be considered adequate. Improvements in these fields are seriously needed. Although this Budget does not contemplate major extensions in the next fiscal year, I recommend that the Congress lay the legislative ground work now for the needed improvements, including general health insurance and a long-range housing program.

The costs of social welfare, education, and housing bring the cumulative total above 35.4 billion dollars.

The remainder of the Budget totals 2.1 billion dollars. Nearly one-third is for war liquidation, including the overhead cost of disposing of surplus property. The rest is for services to business and labor through the Commerce Department and Labor Department, for general functions of the Treasury, the General Accounting Office, the legislative branch, the judicial branch, and the Executive Office of the President, and for many other items. These services, with a total cost of less than 5 percent of the Budget, are an indispensable part of the machinery of the Government.

The Budget total of expenditures thus comes to 37.5 billion dollars.

It has always been the Government's duty to provide whatever assistance is required to afford private enterprise a chance to prosper. In the nineteenth century a principal economic service of the Federal Government was the opening of the West. The Government acquired the territory, granted lands to settlers, gave military protection, and subsidized railroads and highways—thereby opening opportunities for the private initiative of the American people.

Today, our great new frontiers are in river-valley developments, in air transport, in new scientific discoveries, and in application of the new science and technology to human progress. These new frontiers can be developed only by the cooperation of Government and private enterprise.

Our expenditures on developmental projects are a good investment for the Government. They increase the productive power of the country and make for higher living standards. Directly or indirectly, the Government recovers the cost in the form of either service charges or increased revenue yields to the Treasury.

The Federal Government promotes improvements in agricultural methods. It provides many services to private enterprise that could not be organized except by Government. The Bureau of Standards, for example, furnishes basic scientific data. The Weather Bureau supplies information used by thousands of farmers and business concerns and has a rapidly developing field of work in aviation weather reporting. Maps and charts, as well as lighthouses, beacons, and other physical aids to navigation, are supplied by the Federal Government. Many kinds of statistical reports, required by American business, are also provided.

Since 1939, our complex system for the production of goods and services has grown so much that more services than ever are required from the Government. We cannot risk retarding our growth by lack of roads, electric power, air-navigation facilities, engineering data, maps, education, surveys of resources, weather reports, protection against disease, or any other necessary instrument of progress. There is a multitude of Government activities which the whole Nation takes for granted and on which our prosperity depends.

Let me now review briefly the appropriation side of the Budget.

This Budget recommends appropriations of 31.3 billion dollars for the fiscal year 1948 under existing and proposed legislation. It recommends that authority of 1.5 billion dollars be granted certain agencies to contract for services and supplies, such as aircraft and construction. Payments under such authority will be financed from appropriations to be made in subsequent years.

The expenditures for 1948 still reflect a portion of the cost of our tremendous war program for which appropriations were made in previous years. They also reflect certain large international commitments likewise previously authorized. These two factors in large measure explain why estimated expenditures for 1948 are so much more than the appropriations recommended for that year.

Existing appropriations available for obligation in 1948 and subsequent years are again under review. As these appropriations become unnecessary, their withdrawal will be recommended to the Congress.

The Federal Government, as shown by the size of its Budget, has far greater obligations than at any time before the war. Although the Budget reflects the urgent need for rigorous economy in the execution of every program, expenditures are inevitably large. The American people surely will not shirk their new responsibilities at home and abroad. They will supply the necessary funds to meet these responsibilities.

RECEIPTS

As previously indicated, I cannot recommend tax reduction. The responsibilities of the Federal Government cannot be fully met in the fiscal year 1948 at a lower cost than here indicated. Even if the cost were less it would be desirable in our present economic situation to maintain revenues in order to make a start toward the repayment of the national debt. At the present time, in my judgment, high taxes contribute to the welfare and security of the country.

Under the wartime tax system, millions of taxpayers with small incomes are called upon to pay high taxes. When the time comes for taxes to be reduced, these taxpayers will have a high priority among the claimants for tax relief.

I have recommended that the war excise-tax rates due to expire July 1, 1947, be continued. When the time comes for excise-tax revision, the Congress should review the entire group of excise taxes rather than concentrate attention on those that were imposed or increased during the war.

Our long-run tax program must be designed to maintain purchasing power and provide incentives for a high level of production.

In the corporation section of this message, legislation is recommended which will require return to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts of certain capital funds totaling 379 million dollars.

I also recommend that the Congress reconsider the extent to which fees should be charged for services rendered by the Federal Government. While it is not sound public policy to charge for all services of the Federal Government on a full-cost basis, and many services should be provided free, the Government should receive adequate compensation for certain services primarily of direct benefit to limited groups. For example, I believe that a reasonable share of the cost to the Federal Government for providing specialized transportation facilities, such as airways, should be recovered.

Budget receipts

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Source	Actual, 1946	Estimate, 1947	Estimate, 1948
Direct taxes on individuals	$19,008	$18,637	$19,120
Direct taxes on corporations	12,906	9,227	8,270
Excise taxes	6,696	7,283	6,118
Employment taxes	1,714	1,955	2,694
Customs	435	496	517
Miscellaneous receipts:
Present law	3,480	3,987	2,620
Proposed legislation			379
Total receipts	44,239	41,585	39,717
Less net appropriation to old age and survivors insurance trust fund	1,201	1,355	1,987
Budget receipts	43,038	40,230	37,730
Proposed continuation of war excise rates (not included in Budget receipts)		37	1,130

Receipts from direct taxes on individuals are estimated to decrease from the fiscal year 1946 to 1947 because of the lower effective individual income-tax rates in the Revenue Act of 1945, and to increase from the fiscal year 1947 to 1948 because of higher incomes. Direct taxes on corporations decline in the fiscal year 1947 and further in 1948 largely because of repeal of the excess-profits tax.

The excise-tax estimates increase in 1947 because of increased consumer demand and increased production, and decline under present law in 1948 because of the expiration of the war-tax rates of the Revenue Act of 1943. The employment-tax estimates show increases in both fiscal years, due in 1947 mostly to larger pay rolls, and in 1948 mostly to increases in rates as provided by law. Miscellaneous receipts increase in 1947 over 1946 largely because of increased receipts from disposition of surplus property and decline in 1948 largely because of a decline in surplus-property receipts.

BORROWING AND THE PUBLIC DEBT

The public debt reached a peak last February at 279 billion dollars. During the remainder of the calendar year, the debt was reduced by over 20 billion dollars and stood near 259 billion dollars at the end of December. Most of the securities retired were held by banks. This reduction was accomplished by drawing down the Treasury cash balance to a level more in line with peacetime requirements.

We propose to continue the sale of savings bonds. The proceeds will be available to redeem marketable securities—particularly those held by the banking system. It is important that every citizen in a position to do so help to maintain a sound economic situation by purchasing and holding United States savings bonds.

The annual interest charge of about 5 billion dollars is less than 3 percent of our current national income. It is well within our capacity to pay, particularly if we keep up a high volume of national production. The best method of keeping down the burden of the debt is to maintain prosperity. A single year of depression can lay more burdens on the people than many years of gradual debt reduction can relieve.

Our debt-management policy is designed to hold interest rates at the present low level and to prevent undue fluctuations in the bond market. This policy has eased the financial problems of reconversion for both business and government. The stability of the Government bond market has been a major factor in the business confidence which has been of such value in achieving full production. Low-interest rates have also relieved the burden on the taxpayer. The Treasury and the Federal Reserve System will continue their effective control of interest rates.

EXPENDITURE PROGRAMS

In this year's Budget, expenditures are grouped under a new functional classification in order to present to the Congress and the people a clearer picture of the purposes for which Federal funds are spent. To facilitate comparison, figures for previous years are also given on the new basis. The new classification is described in detail in part IV of this Budget.

The Budget classifications and Budget totals reflect all transactions in the general and special accounts and the excess of expenditures over receipts of wholly owned Government corporations. For the first time, the net expenditures of wholly owned corporations are classified on a functional basis. The Budget totals do not include the operations of trust accounts. However, such transactions, when significant, are discussed in connection with the various Budget programs.

National defense

Expenditures for "National defense" remain by far the largest category in the Budget. The cost of maintaining the military, air, and naval forces necessary in the fiscal year 1948 will be high. The present defense establishment requires larger forces, more complex mechanized equipment, more intensive use of equipment, and more extensive developmental activity than before the war.

However, in the fiscal year 1948 these expenditures will be but one-eighth of the outlays in the peak wartime fiscal year, 1945. This drastic cut reflects a corresponding reduction in the size of the armed forces. Outlays for munitions have been reduced even more.

Despite these reductions, our defense establishments will not have fallen to its ultimate peacetime level by the end of the fiscal year 1948. We still have large responsibilities arising out of the war. Military occupation in Europe and the Far East must continue. The lines of communication and supporting installations for the occupation forces must be maintained. Recruits must be trained as replacements.

The high cost of our defense establishments requires that the program be operated with the utmost efficiency. In the estimates for 1948 emphasis has been placed on eliminating as much duplication and overlapping in activities as is possible under present conditions. In my State of the Union Message I have again urged establishment of a single department of national defense. This is an important step in the search for economy and efficiency in organization and administration of the armed services.

I recently appointed an advisory commission to study the need for a universal training program. We still have available from the war much of the equipment and installations which will be needed for such a program. The program, after it has been worked out and approved, will still require considerable time to get under way. Estimates for it have, therefore, not been included in this Budget. Since plans are not complete for the training program, a small amount has been included in the Budget to cover the cost of induction machinery whenever provision is made for it.

[a] Excludes disbursements of approximately 1,500 million dollars for the War Department and 250 million dollars for the Navy Department which have appeared as Budget expenditures in previous years.

Expenditures: "National defense," as used in this Budget, is much less inclusive than the category used last year. For example, War Department expenditures of 645 million dollars in 1948 for supplies to and administration of occupied areas (other than Army pay, subsistence, and related items) are now in "International affairs and finance." Likewise, expenditures for the atomic energy activities of the Manhattan District project beginning January 1, 1947, when the Atomic Energy Commission took control, are shown in "Natural resources." For the fiscal year 1946 and the first 6 months of the fiscal year 1947 this program remains in "National defense."

The level of expenditures for "National defense" in 1947 would have been 1.7 billion dollars higher, and the reduction from 1947 to 1948 correspondingly greater, except for certain adjustments—1.5 billion dollars in War Department accounts and 250 million dollars in Navy accounts. Some funds withdrawn from the Treasury in 1946 and earlier years, and reported as expenditures at the time, were not used until 1947. Also some expenditures by the War Department in 1947 were offset by credits from funds which had accumulated in trust accounts during the war.

The expenditure estimate of 11.1 billion dollars in 1948 for the Army and Navy for military purposes reflects the reductions from the current fiscal year in the number of military personnel and in war-liquidation outlays—such as mustering-out payments (reduced by 370 million dollars), contract termination (700 million dollars), and surplus property handling. On the other side, the estimate reflects greater procurement in the fiscal year 1948, as war inventories cease to be available to supply current needs.

The estimated expenditures of 6.7 billion dollars for the War Department in the fiscal year 1948 include 132 million dollars for public works under supplemental legislation. The Navy expenditures of 4.4 billion dollars also include 77 million dollars for ship construction and public works under supplemental legislation. In both instances the objective is to return to the peacetime procedure of obtaining specific legislative authority for these programs.

Taken together, the War and Navy Department expenditures estimated for the fiscal year 1948 provide for an average military strength of 1,641,000 men and officers. Of this, Army strength is projected at 1,070,000 throughout the year; Navy and Marine strength will begin the year at 598,000 and average 571,000. These figures compare with an average strength in the fiscal year 1947 of 2,108,000. Pay, subsistence, travel, welfare, training, clothing, and medical expenditures for military personnel are estimated at 5.2 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1948, as against 6.7 billion dollars in the current year. Average annual costs per man for these purposes—about 3,100 dollars in 1948—have increased markedly since VJ-day. Fully 45 percent of Army and Navy expenditures in 1948 are in this category.

Expenditures by the War and Navy Departments for all other military purposes are estimated at 5.9 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1948. This sum covers procurement, research and development, construction, operation and maintenance, and citizen-reserve activities. The estimates for 1948 contemplate proceeding with construction projects of highest priority at overseas bases and in the continental United States, and limiting procurement to those items essential for the current operation, maintenance, and training of the military forces, except for aircraft and limited quantities of newly developed items.

Effective defense under modern conditions requires us to push ahead in scientific and technological fields. Toward this end, expenditures for research and development by the Army and Navy are projected at 530 million dollars in the fiscal year 1948—slightly above their 1947 rate. Similarly, we must keep alive the knowledge of military skills among our citizens. To provide for an orderly expansion of citizen-reserve organizations, expenditures of 308 million dollars are projected in 1948—about two-thirds more than the outlays in the current fiscal year when these programs are getting under way. The Reserve organizations of the Army will still be below planned strength at the end of 1948.

The bulk of the terminated Army and Navy contracts has already been settled, with creditable dispatch. For all agencies, total commitments canceled on 318,000 prime contracts exceed 65 billion dollars. After deducting credits due the Government, total payments to contractors under the entire program are estimated at about 6.5 billion dollars. Of this total, about three-fourths of a billion dollars remained for payment at the beginning of the fiscal year 1947. Most of this has now been paid in final settlements or in advances pending settlement.

Applications for terminal-leave payments to enlisted military personnel have been smaller than expected. It is now estimated that 1.9 billion dollars will be paid in 1947 and only 250 million dollars in 1948.

Lend-lease expenditures in the fiscal year 1947 from funds appropriated to the President are largely interappropriation adjustments and payments for articles procured and services rendered in previous years. In 1948 there will be very small expenditures—all for closing out the program.

Except for some military aid to China and minor items, lend-lease was terminated after VJ-day. Since then, lend-lease goods valued at over 1 billion dollars have been sold to foreign countries on a cash or credit basis. Much progress has been made in effecting settlements with the countries which received about 50 billion dollars of lend-lease aid and extended almost 8 billion dollars of reciprocal aid. Final settlements have now been negotiated with the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, India, France, Belgium, and Turkey, and discussions with the Netherlands, Norway, and the Union of South Africa are nearing completion.

The military program for stock piling of strategic materials has been reviewed carefully to minimize interference with business requirements. New stock piling is estimated at 90 million dollars in the fiscal year 1947 and 33 million dollars in 1948. In addition, excess metals and materials, amounting to 87 million dollars this year and 210 million dollars in the fiscal year 1948, will be transferred from Reconstruction Finance Corporation stocks to the Treasury military stock pile. Apart from stock piles transferred to the Treasury, the receipts of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in its war activities reflect largely the rental and disposal of excess war plants, together with the sale of metals, minerals, and other commodities to the public.

Appropriations: To finance the expenditure program outlined above, appropriations of 9.5 billion dollars and new contract authorizations of 541 million dollars will be necessary in the fiscal year 1948. These totals include 262 million dollars of supplemental appropriations and 91 million dollars of contract authorizations under legislation shortly to be submitted. The new appropriations needed in 1948 are about 2 billion dollars lower than the estimated expenditures, which include provision for payment of substantial amounts of unliquidated obligations of prior years.

International affairs and finance

The budget for our international program is designed to contribute to a peaceful world and a stable world economy. We have definite responsibilities to our wartime allies and in occupied countries. Our international lending program is an essential part of our efforts to achieve a world economy in which private trade will flourish.

The period when large-scale general relief is required for our allies is almost over. With the termination of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, there will remain, however, the urgent question of refugees and displaced persons. I urge the Congress to provide adequate support for the International Refugee Organization, now in process of being formed under the United Nations. It is also necessary that we provide a modest relief program for a few countries which are still in desperate straits. I recommend that the Congress speedily enact legislation to authorize these expenditures for which I am making provision in this Budget. In addition, I recommend that the Congress authorize participation in the World Health Organization and the proposed International Trade Organization and have included the small amounts needed for their support.

Expenditures: The sharp decline in total expenditures in the fiscal year 1948 is due chiefly to the fact that in 1947 we shall complete our payment to the International Monetary Fund and our basic cash subscription to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Further liabilities to the International Bank will arise only if we are called upon, within the limits of our total subscription, to join with other countries in making good any defaults by borrowers from the Bank.

More than half of our expenditures in the international field in the fiscal year 1948 will be loans for reconstruction or trade expansion. Disbursements will be predominantly under existing commitments. By the end of the fiscal year 1948 we shall have discharged about three-fourths of our commitments under our loan agreement with Britain. Since the International Bank is now ready for business, new authorizations for reconstruction loans by the Export-Import Bank are being sharply curtailed. In the future, the Export-Import Bank will be primarily concerned with loans to finance United States trade and small developmental loans in which we have a special interest. Outlays by the Export-Import Bank in the fiscal years 1946 and 1947 have been financed to a considerable extent by the sale of capital stock to the Treasury. Since the Treasury subscription is now complete, future net outlays will be financed entirely by sale of notes to the Treasury.

The existing appropriation for United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration expires at the end of the current fiscal year. Estimated expenditures in 1948 are entirely to wind up the program.

During the fiscal year 1948, the War Department will incur expenditures for administration and relief in Germany, Japan, Korea, and the Ryukyus and for administration in Austria. We must continue to provide subsistence to prevent disease, hunger, and unrest, and to provide proper administration, if these lands are eventually to become democratic and self-supporting. Moreover, shipments of food and other supplies are required to maintain the working efficiency of the populations and to stimulate production. Resulting increases in exports from these areas will furnish a growing source of funds to pay for necessary imports and thus help eliminate the need for financial assistance.

The recent agreement for economic unification of the British and United States zones in Germany will increase exports from those zones and help to make them self-sufficient by the end of the calendar year 1949. All costs incurred for the support of the German economy are to be repaid out of future German exports as quickly as recovery permits.

An important contribution to the economic revival of the occupied areas is being made by Federal agencies, such as the U. S. Commercial Company, in temporarily financing exports from these areas. Net dollar proceeds are currently being used primarily to purchase raw materials and equipment needed for a further expansion of exports in order to hasten the time when the occupied areas will become fully self-supporting. To aid in this program, I urge that the Congress authorize the U. S. Commercial Company to continue operations beyond June 30, 1947, the present expiration date.

Aid for the Philippine Republic includes assistance in rebuilding its economy, payments to fulfill our pledge to compensate partially for war damage, and maintenance of training programs for Philippine citizens. The 1947 total includes a Reconstruction Finance Corporation loan of 75 million dollars for aid in financing the current budget of the Republic.

Estimated expenditures of 18 million dollars for our membership in international organizations consist primarily of our share of the administrative budgets of the United Nations and its affiliated specialized organizations. In view of the immense tasks we have entrusted to the international organizations, this is a modest sum. Our contribution to the International Refugee Organization and funds for additional relief are included under proposed legislation.

Expenditures by the State Department are expected to increase in the fiscal year 1948. It is of utmost importance that the Department be equipped with sufficient funds and an adequate staff to make its maximum contribution to international peace. In 1948 there will be an increase of expenditures to carry on the improved Foreign Service program authorized under the Foreign Service Act of 1946. The Budget estimate for the Foreign Service buildings fund provides for the purchase of real property obtained by the Office of the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner in lend-lease and surplus-property settlement agreements with other nations. Payment for these properties by the State Department increases miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury by a corresponding amount.

Appropriations: Appropriations for the fiscal year 1948 total 1,169 million dollars, mainly for the administration and relief of occupied countries and for various State Department programs. Funds for loans by the Export-Import Bank in the fiscal year 1948 will be obtained under its current borrowing authority. Advances to the United Kingdom will be made under the existing authorization. The appropriations total includes 11 million dollars of anticipated supplementals for the State Department and 76 million dollars for proposed legislation.

Veterans' services and benefits

The Servicemen's Readjustment Act provides education and training benefits, unemployment and self-employment allowances, and loan guarantees. National service life insurance is an additional tangible benefit. For those who suffered disabilities, the best of medical care is provided. Pension rates for disabled veterans and for dependents of veterans were increased by the last Congress. In addition to the veterans' program, our servicemen have been assisted in resuming civilian life by mustering-out payments and terminal-leave payments.

Since the main purpose of our veterans' program is to reestablish former servicemen in civilian life, we must carefully avoid types of assistance which would encourage, or unnecessarily prolong, dependence upon Government subsidy. Any other policy would not only put an intolerable burden upon the taxpayer, but would be a great disservice to veterans themselves.

Although some amendments to veterans' legislation may still be required, no major new programs of assistance appear necessary. The job is now primarily one of effective administration. The Veterans' Administration has made great progress in establishing machinery that will administer this comprehensive program with speed and equity.

Expenditures: The readjustment benefits program as a whole will continue in 1948 at its present level, as reductions in unemployment allowances will be offset by increases in education and loan-guarantee expenditures. These estimates assume continuing prosperity and present legislation.

In the fiscal year 1947, almost 1,100,000 veterans, on the average, are drawing unemployment allowances and more than 200,000 are receiving self-employment allowances, at a time when total unemployment in the United States is less than 2,500,000. The turn-over on the allowance rolls has been rapid. Almost one-half of the 14,000,000 discharged from the services have already drawn unemployment or self-employment allowances. In recent months tightened administration and a more positive job-placement program by the employment service have contributed to a reduction in the numbers on the allowance rolls. In the fiscal year 1948 it is expected that about 900,000 veterans on the average will receive nearly one billion dollars in these allowances.

On the average 2,000,000 veterans are receiving education and training benefits in the fiscal year 1947. In 1948 possibly 2,100,000 will participate at a cost of over 2.3 billion dollars. We have had to meet an acute situation with respect to educational and housing facilities in universities, colleges, and schools throughout the country. In the fiscal year 1948 the Federal Works Agency will largely complete the conversion of war surplus facilities for educational purposes.

The number of trainees receiving on-the-job training has increased sharply to over 600,000. To guard against misuse of public funds, the Congress, in its last session, wisely provided limitations on subsistence allowances to veterans whose earnings exceed fixed monthly amounts and also clarified the standards to be used by the States in approving training—establishments. Such limitations on subsistence allowances are essential to assure equity for veterans and taxpayers alike.

Amendments liberalizing the loan-guarantee program have brought a sharp increase in the number of loans guaranteed and in the average size of the guarantee. During the fiscal year 1947 new loans will be guaranteed for 750,000 veterans; in 1948 for possibly 1,000,000. Roughly, 90 percent of these loans are made to finance home purchases by veterans. Expenditures in 1948 will be somewhat higher than in 1947—just over 100 million dollars for payment of the first year's interest on the guaranteed portion of the loan and for losses which are still relatively small.

Pension payments to disabled veterans and to dependents of veterans rose sharply from 1946 to 1947, as claims arising in World War II were granted. The increase in 1947 expenditures also reflects the 20-percent rise in pension rates approved by the last session of the Congress. Estimated expenditures of 2.5 billion dollars for pensions in 1948 include about 150 million dollars for subsistence allowances to disabled trainees and students. An average of 3,150,000 individuals will receive pensions and compensation in 1948—50 percent more than in 1946. This program will continue to increase for years to come.

Expenditures for insurance, which are mostly transfers to the national service life insurance trust fund, will decline sharply in 1948 with a corresponding decline in the trust-fund accumulations. The total cost to the Government for servicemen's insurance in World War II will approach 3.7 billion dollars by the end of 1948 with small additional costs to come later.

The most extensive hospital and domiciliary construction program in the history of this Nation is now under way. The construction of veterans' hospitals and domiciliary facilities now authorized and recommended for authorization aggregates 1 billion dollars. Such construction, chiefly under the direction of the Corps of Engineers, will continue to increase in the fiscal year 1948. Less than half of the total program, however, will be completed by the end of that year.

In the fiscal year 1948 the operating and general administration expenses for veterans' programs as a whole will be somewhat higher than in the present year, chiefly because of the expansion of hospital facilities and improvement of medical care.

General administrative expenses for programs other than hospital and medical care are estimated in 1948 at about the 1947 level. The number of veterans participating in the readjustment, pension, and insurance programs will be higher, but the work load will fall as the number of entrants drops off.

The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is carrying out a decentralization program aimed at attaining more effective administration through more direct contact with veterans in their communities.

Appropriations: For these veterans' programs, this Budget recommends appropriations of 7,009 million dollars and contract authorizations of 220 million dollars to cover obligations to be incurred in the fiscal year 1948.

Social welfare, health, and security

In spite of the achievements of the past 11 years in promoting the health, welfare, and social security of the American people, much remains to be done. Our present program affords but partial protection against the major causes of insecurity; large segments of the population are excluded from its benefits. We have not yet done enough to secure good health for the Nation.

The Federal Security Agency has recently been given broader jurisdiction over the social-welfare activities of the Government. As previously recommended, I favor creating a well integrated, yet flexible, Cabinet department of health, education, and social security to supersede this agency.

I hope that the studies already undertaken by congressional committees will result in the prompt expansion and integration of the present social-security system. There is, for example, serious need to correct inequalities between States in public assistance payments and to extend the scope of Federal aid to include general assistance programs. The temporary increase in Federal grants for public assistance enacted in the last session of Congress will expire December 31, 1947; the Congress should now consider permanent legislation in this field. The estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1948 include provision for such legislation.

The old-age and survivors insurance system at present leaves out 40 percent of those who earn their living. Even greater numbers are outside the unemployment compensation program. It is unjust to deny these agricultural workers, public employees, and other excluded groups the protection of social insurance. The system should be extended to cover them. At the same time, retirement benefits for the aged should be liberalized to reduce the necessity for piecing out insurance benefits with public-assistance payments.

Recent legislation for hospital construction, for increased activities in mental health, and for expanded maternal and child-health services are substantial achievements toward improving the substandard health level of a large part of the population. But the major problem of financing health care still persists. Therefore, I again urge the Congress to enact a health-insurance program which will make adequate medical care available to everyone and provide protection against the economic hardships of sickness. Such a program should be almost entirely self-financing through pay-roll contributions.

The proceeds of Federal pay-roll taxes to cover old-age and survivors insurance are deducted from the receipts side of the Budget and do not appear as Budget expenditures. For the railroad retirement system, however, the pay-roll tax receipts are included in net Budget receipts and the amounts transferred to the trust account appear in Budget expenditures. Similarly, the Government contribution to the Federal employees' retirement funds is a transfer included in Budget expenditures.

Trust fund withdrawals by the States to pay unemployment benefits depend not only on the number of unemployed in covered employment, but also on the rate of turn-over. Budget expenditures for unemployment and accident compensation are mainly Federal grants to the States for administrative expenses of unemployment compensation. With high employment, accumulations in the trust fund will continue and administrative expenses will remain low.

Withdrawals from the trust fund for old-age and survivors insurance will continue to increase over a long period. As the program matures, the number of beneficiaries and the average benefit will gradually rise. A large estimated increase in receipts of this fund in the fiscal year 1948 is based on the assumption that the employment tax will rise from the present 2-percent rate on employers and employees to 5 percent on January 1, 1948, in accordance with present law.

Estimates for Budget expenditures for retirement and dependency insurance reflect the action of the last Congress in broadening the Railroad Retirement Act by adding survivors insurance and liberalizing benefits. Employer and employee tax rates were increased, resulting in larger payments to the trust account. These payments, which vary according to the railroad-pay-roll level, are expected to continue high. The major part of administrative expenses for old-age and survivors insurance is now paid directly from the old-age and survivors insurance trust fund and is therefore not included in Budget expenditures after the fiscal year 1946; this change is responsible for a sharp drop in the Budget item for the Federal Security Agency for retirement and dependency insurance.

Federal payments for assistance to the aged and other special groups are expected to increase in the fiscal year 1948 because of a continuing long-term rise in benefit levels and case loads. A sharp rise in the expenditures in the fiscal year 1947 results from the higher public assistance benefits under temporary legislation and the inclusion of the school-lunch program in this category beginning this year.

Expenditures for promotion of public health are estimated slightly higher than in the current year. Although the total for the fiscal year 1948 includes expanded research and State-aid programs, including the Federal-State hospital program, these additions are largely offset by reductions of 24 million dollars owing to termination of the nurses' training program and of the maternity and infant-care program for families of servicemen.

Appropriations: For the fiscal year 1948 the Budget includes appropriations of 1,877 million dollars, of which 74 million dollars are for proposed legislation. The recommended appropriation for the Railroad Retirement Board for the fiscal year 1948 exceeds the estimated expenditures to permit transfer to the trust account of taxes and income from 1947 and previous years; this transfer will take effect in the current fiscal year. The recommended appropriation for the hospital construction program is greater than the estimated expenditures because the program is just getting under way.

Housing and community facilities

I have urged the Congress to enact the essential features of the general housing bill which was passed by the Senate last year. The most urgent immediate requirements are for incentives and aids to private lenders and builders to provide lower cost housing, especially rental housing, for assistance to local communities in their programs for urban redevelopment and low-rent housing, and for a permanent agency to supervise the major housing activities of the Federal Government.

Expenditures: In our housing program we shall continue to rely primarily upon private housing construction. During the past year, with the assistance of many public and private agencies, we have succeeded in securing a rapid expansion in the supply of building materials available for construction of veterans' housing. With the increased materials flow now evident, emphasis in the coming year will be focused on a few key materials, on acceleration of programs for recruitment and training of labor, and on provision of ample financing facilities for builders and prefabricators, as well as veterans and other purchasers. Particular attention will be given to measures to expand construction of rental housing. Many of these operations to aid private housing construction are reflected in expenditures of the Office of Temporary Controls, the Department of Labor, the Veterans' Administration, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as part of programs classified elsewhere.

The programs of the Federal Housing Administration and the Federal Home Loan Bank Administration involve relatively small net expenditures, but are of major importance in stimulating private construction. In the fiscal year 1948 the Federal Housing Administration expects to guarantee loans on 325,000 homes and apartments, most of them for new construction. During the same period savings and loan associations which are members of the Federal Home Loan Bank System will make an estimated 300,000 loans for financing new homes.

From an expenditure standpoint, the chief aids to private housing in the fiscal year 1948 will be provided by Reconstruction Finance Corporation purchases of mortgages guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration and the Federal Housing Administration. In the fiscal year 1948, purchases of veterans' home loans are expected to account for the great bulk of all mortgages purchased by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. With the rapid rise in guaranteed loans to veterans (see "Veterans' services and benefits"), the Federal Government has recognized that its responsibility to the veterans can be realized only by assuring private financial institutions the same ready market for these obligations that they already possess for mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration. The lending institutions in turn have a responsibility to make sure that their loans will benefit the veterans and will not burden them with impossible future obligations.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds have also been employed to make premium payments to increase the supply of critically scarce building materials. In view of the rapid expansion in output and the decontrol of prices, it appears that these programs can be terminated before the close of the current fiscal year.

The repayment of Home Owners' Loan Corporation loans will taper off in 1948 as its outstanding loans shrink. With its profits in recent years, we can now safely predict that this Corporation—which refinanced the loans of more than a million distressed borrowers during the depression—will liquidate without any loss to the Federal Government.

Expenditures on public housing programs are now concentrated almost entirely on liquidation of war-housing activities and provision of emergency housing units for war veterans. Conversion of barracks and other types of temporary war structures—the largest expenditure item in 1947—will be substantially completed in the current year. Under this program an estimated 255,000 units are being provided for veterans and their families—more than half for veterans in educational institutions.

The continued housing shortage in many industrial areas has made it necessary for the Government to continue operating many temporary war-housing units longer than previously expected. More than half of these units are occupied by veterans and servicemen. Expenditures in the fiscal year 1948 for management and disposition of war housing show an apparent increase primarily because receipts from the program are now deposited in miscellaneous receipts, rather than credited against expenditures. Payments of 85 million dollars also are forecast to transfer previous net receipts from rentals and sales into the general receipts of the Treasury. If allowance is made for these transfers and nonrecurring net receipts of 64 million dollars in 1947 from liquidation of the Defense Homes Corporation, program expenditures for war housing will decline substantially in 1948 from 1947 levels.

Receipts from the low-rent housing program will temporarily exceed expenditures in the current fiscal year because of anticipated repayments of loans by local housing authorities. Annual contributions to local housing authorities required by previous contracts will rise gradually as wartime tenants are replaced by low-income occupants.

Expenditures of the Federal Works Agency for defense public works will be virtually completed in the fiscal year 1948. Disbursements to localities for detailed planning of local public works will be limited to previous commitments under existing legislation.

On the other hand, disbursements on Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans to local agencies for construction of self-liquidating projects will be increased as materials become available to resume urgently needed work. To make sure that funds are adequate for these disbursements, I request that the present 100-million-dollar limitation on Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans for these purposes be increased to 125 million dollars.

Appropriations: Of the total of 179 million dollars in appropriations estimated for the fiscal year 1948, an estimated 150 million dollars will be from current rental and disposition receipts of the veterans' reuse and war housing programs. Most of the 1948 expenditures will be made from Corporation funds or from unexpended balances of previous appropriations.

Education and general research

Our generous provision for education under the veterans' program should not obscure the fact that the Federal Government has large responsibilities for the general improvement of educational opportunities throughout the country. Although the expenditure estimates for the coming fiscal year are limited to present programs, I have long been on record for basic legislation under which the Federal Government will supplement the resources of the States to assist them to equalize educational opportunities and achieve satisfactory educational standards.

The relationship of the Federal Government to higher education also demands serious consideration. The veterans' readjustment program, which compelled a rapid emergency expansion of facilities to meet immediate needs, has focused attention on this fundamental problem. A Presidential commission on higher education is studying the matter because of its great importance to the future of the Nation.

Many agencies of the Federal Government carry on research as a part of their regular programs. But we need a central agency to correlate and encourage the research activities of the country. While freedom of inquiry must be preserved, the Federal Government should accept responsibility for fostering the flow of scientific knowledge and developing scientific talent in our youth. To accomplish this, I recommend again that a National Science Foundation, or its equivalent, be established. The Scientific Research Board appointed in October 1946 is now making a study of the research program of the entire Federal Government in its relation to all other research activities planned or in progress. Its report will undoubtedly be of service in establishing a proper program for the new agency. It is assumed that no additional expenditures will be required during the fiscal year 1948.

Office of Scientific Research and Development	34	4	----	----
Commerce Department	8	11	14	14
Other agencies	----	----	1	1

Expenditures: Federal expenditures for promotion of education, apart from the veterans' education program, now consist almost entirely of vocational grants to States, support of land-grant colleges, and general administration of the Office of Education. The Federal Works Agency will complete during the fiscal year 1948 its expenditures for the maintenance and operation of schools in war-affected communities. Corresponding expenditures prior to the current fiscal year are classified in "Housing and community facilities."

In August 1946, the Congress increased the authorization for vocational education by 15 million dollars. It is not possible at this time, however, for the State and local governments to make firm commitments on the availability of matching funds for the development of new programs of vocational education or the expansion of existing programs. Therefore, although the estimates of appropriations and expenditures for the fiscal year 1948 include an anticipated supplemental appropriation under this authorization, it may be necessary to increase the amount on the basis of later information from State and local governments. Money for this purpose has been included in the reserve for contingencies.

Expenditures for educational aid to special groups include funds for education of Indians through the Department of the Interior and smaller amounts for assistance to the blind and the deaf and to Howard University through the Federal Security Agency. The major part of the estimated increase in expenditures is for construction of four buildings at Howard University, for which Congress has already appropriated money for drawing plans. Their construction is made urgent by the pressure of enrollment upon all existing facilities.

The increase in expenditures for library and museum services is due chiefly to the general expansion of activities of the Library of Congress.

Research is inherent in many Federal programs and consequently the bulk of such expenditures is included in the specific programs to which the research relates. The principal items of continuing expenditure for those research programs which serve several purposes or are general in character are in the Bureau of the Census, the Bureau of Standards, and the Coast and Geodetic Survey—all within the Department of Commerce. Some expansion of these activities is contemplated in the estimates for the fiscal year 1948. The Office of Scientific Research and Development, which was devoted to research in support of the war effort, will be almost completely liquidated in the fiscal year 1947.

Appropriations: The total of appropriations for education and general research is 85 million dollars for the fiscal year 1948—3 million dollars less than the estimated expenditures. This total includes a tentative estimate of the amount which will be required under the new authorization for vocational education.

Agriculture and agricultural resources

Because of high consumer incomes in the United States and the continuing world shortage of many foods, the demand for farm products will doubtless remain strong throughout the fiscal year 1948. Agricultural production goals for the 1947 crop year, with a few exceptions, will call for another year of maximum output.

The demand for American farm products, however, cannot be counted upon to continue indefinitely at the present high level. Under present legislation the Department of Agriculture is required to support prices of most agricultural commodities until December 31, 1948.

We must design our agricultural policies to work toward a better balance of supply with demand and so avoid excessive expenditures for price support. We should facilitate the transfer of unnecessary farm labor and resources from agriculture to industrial and other pursuits. We shall need also to devise ways of supporting farm income which will retain export markets for wheat, cotton, and tobacco, and at the same time give the American consumer the benefit of increasing efficiency in farm production.

The authority of the Commodity Credit Corporation expires on June 30, 1947. Since the Corporation now has a State charter, I am recommending that it be rechartered by act of Congress and that its present borrowing authority of 4,750 million dollars be renewed.

Expenditures: By the fiscal year 1948 the program of the Commodity Credit Corporation will be limited almost entirely to price support for agricultural commodities. Reimbursements from lend-lease, United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, and foreign governments will be largely completed in the next 6 months. Liquidation of inventories is tapering off. For the present, the high level of farm prices has made price-support outlays unnecessary except for a few commodities such as potatoes and eggs.

In 1948, however, even with continued general prosperity, an estimated 330 million dollars will be spent to support agricultural prices. Larger outlays will be required should markets weaken seriously. In addition, loans by commercial banks guaranteed by the Commodity Credit Corporation will probably be substantial. The present borrowing authority, if renewed, will be ample to support agricultural prices during the fiscal year 1948.

Receipts from other corporate transactions in the Department of Agriculture are expected to be lower in 1947 and 1948 than in 1946. In 1946 there were unusually large repayments to the farm credit agencies and large receipts in revolving funds of the Treasury from return of capital of mixed-ownership corporations. In view of the large repayments and refinancing of the loans of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, this Budget recommends that the Corporation's borrowing authority of 2 billion dollars be reduced to an amount more nearly commensurate with foreseeable needs. This recommendation should be considered when the Farm Credit Administration submits its report on the mortgage-loan programs of the Corporation and the Federal land banks.

The rural rehabilitation and farm-tenant programs, formerly under the Farm Security Administration, and the Crop and Feed Loan Division of the Farm Credit Administration have been merged to form the new Farmers' Home Administration. This program shows an apparent increase in 1948, solely because of the changed method of financing required in the Farmers' Home Administration Act of 1946.

The increased estimates for Rural Electrification Administration loans will permit expansion of a program that is urgently needed by farmers but has been held back during the war years.

Commitments for payments to farmers under the Agricultural Adjustment Administration conservation and use program for the 1947 crop year have already been made as provided by the 1947 appropriation act. Expenditures for this program, including administrative expenses, are estimated at 311 million dollars in the fiscal year 1948.

A year ago the Budget message recommended gradual reduction of these payments, and that recommendation is now renewed. More than 60 percent of the total payments go to about one-eighth of the Nation's farmers. Most of this money thus is being paid to farmers who, because of their strong position in American agriculture, would undoubtedly continue the best farm management practices without the persuasion of a bonus from the Treasury.

We should shift our effort from this kind of subsidy to providing technical guidance to all farmers for soil conservation and management, along the lines of the Soil Conservation Service and the Extension Service. I therefore propose that the appropriation act limit the conservation and use program for the crop year 1948 to 200 million dollars instead of the 300-million-dollar program to which we are committed for the crop year 1947. This will not affect expenditures materially until the fiscal year 1949.

Expenditures to encourage exportation and domestic consumption of farm products are financed under section 32 of the act of August 24, 1935, by a permanent appropriation equal to 30 percent of customs receipts. In the fiscal year 1946 expenditures for the school-lunch program were financed by this appropriation. These have been transferred to "Social welfare, health, and security" in later years. The remaining expenditures in 1947 and 1948 are for export subsidies, diversion of surplus commodities to new uses, and purchase and distribution of surplus agricultural commodities to State welfare agencies. Addition of the cotton export subsidy program previously financed by the Commodity Credit Corporation and other increases offset the transfer of the school-lunch program.

Almost all wartime food subsidy programs of the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have now been discontinued. Subsidy payments from corporate funds in the fiscal year 1948 will be limited to sugar, which is expected to remain in short supply. In addition, payments to sugar growers in the United States under the Sugar Act program will remain at approximately the present level.

Expenditures for agricultural land and water resources, which include the Soil Conservation Service, upstream erosion and flood control, water conservation and utilization, and the submarginal land program, are estimated to increase slightly in 1948.

Expansion of agricultural research under the Research and Marketing Act of 1946 will cost an additional 18 million dollars in the fiscal year 1948. The farm labor supply program will decrease by about 16 million dollars. Other general programs for the development and improvement of agriculture, such as the Extension Service, the scientific research agencies, and the staff agencies of the Department of Agriculture, will remain at about the present level. Thus, the programs in this category as a whole will increase by 3 million dollars.

Appropriations: To carry out our agricultural programs, I recommend that the Congress appropriate 824 million dollars for the fiscal year 1948. In addition, since not all of the permanent appropriation of section 32 funds will be required to subsidize exportation and domestic consumption of surplus agricultural commodities, the transfer of 100 million dollars to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration program for conservation and use of agricultural land resources is recommended. In 1947, 42.5 million dollars of section 32 funds were so transferred. In view of the probable need for these funds after 1948 for surplus disposal programs, however, we cannot look forward to their continued annual use for the conservation and use program.

The operations of the various agricultural corporations and the agricultural programs of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will be financed out of corporate funds borrowed from the Treasury. It is estimated that 830 million dollars of notes owed the Treasury by the Commodity Credit Corporation will be canceled in 1948 pursuant to the appraisal of the assets of the Corporation as of June 30, 1946. This cancellation of notes will be an expenditure under general and special accounts and a receipt under corporation accounts, and thus will have no net effect on Budget expenditures or on the appropriations recommended for 1948.

The natural-resources program has been increasing to fill some of the gaps arising from wartime deferments and depletions. The estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1948 represent a further expansion over the current year. They do not contemplate initiation of large new projects.

The harnessing of atomic energy was a war achievement, and it remains of major military significance. With the appointment of the Atomic Energy Commission last fall we have entered on a new phase of development. This Commission has assumed direction of the Manhattan Engineer District project. Our aim is to bring the benefits of atomic research to industry and medicine and to enrich standards of well-being.

In line with the shift in emphasis, the atomic-energy program, since December 31, 1946, is classified in "Natural resources." This transfer in the middle of the current fiscal year and the inclusion on a full-year basis in 1948 are major reasons for the increases in expenditures for resource development in both years.

Expenditures: In order to push forward basic research in development and use of atomic energy, I am recommending a program which will involve expenditures of 444 million dollars in the fiscal year 1948. This compares with total outlays of 385 million dollars in the current fiscal year, of which 179 million dollars are shown in "National defense."

Much of the productive future of this Nation lies in the effective development of our river basins. Under the Bureau of Reclamation and the Corps of Engineers, this work will go forward in 1948 at a somewhat increased expenditure rate. The estimates provide for continuation of projects under way and starting those projects for which 1947 appropriations were made, but which have been temporarily deferred.

The only appropriations now recommended are for projects partly provided for in previous appropriation acts. A substantial portion of the expenditures is for multiple-purpose projects which, in addition to flood control, navigation, and irrigation benefits, will supply needed power for industry and agriculture.

Some expansion of transmission facilities is needed by the Bonneville Power Administration to market the hydroelectric power generated at certain of the Government's multiple-purpose dams. Receipts of 25 million dollars from the sale of power by this agency and the Southwestern Power Administration will be paid into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury in the fiscal year 1948.

Expenditures of the Tennessee Valley Authority will increase in the fiscal year 1948 as work progresses on the two large dams provided for in the 1947 appropriations. By the end of 1948 construction of the major dams will be almost complete; thereafter, the principal activity will be directed toward the effective utilization of local resources for industrial and agricultural improvement within the valley. The Tennessee Valley Authority finances its power operations and transmission facilities from its own revenues. The Authority will continue the practice started in the last fiscal year of making payments to the Treasury.

Expenditures by the International Boundary and Water Commission for the United States share of the construction of dams and other water improvements on the Rio Grande, in cooperation with the Mexican Government, will be expanded in 1948, pursuant to the 1944 treaty.

Among the other expenditures by the Department of the Interior for land and water resources in 1948, the major portion is for the use, protection, and improvement of the public lands which it manages. The estimated expenditures for 1948 for grazing activities contemplate restoration of the program to approximately the 1946 level. Appropriations for the fiscal year 1947 were cut to a level that does not permit adequate protection and conservation of these grazing resources. The Department of the Interior is investigating the feasibility of raising grazing fees to cover the operating costs of the Grazing Service and also service charges on the cost of capital improvements.

Because of critical needs for lumber, our forests, both public and private, must be administered to yield the maximum immediate supply without unduly impairing future timber resources. Expenditures for the Forest Service for the fiscal year 1948 provide for increased timber-sale administration and forest-fire control. These increases are offset by decreases in other phases of the work.

Our mineral resources have been seriously depleted during the war. Substitutes or new sources of supply must now be found. As part of our military program we are accumulating a strategic stock pile of critical materials from both domestic and foreign sources. To plan this program successfully and to assure adequate supplies for industrial and consumer use, it is essential that we have full information on our domestic resources. Consequently, the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey will make small expansions in their mineral resource programs in 1948.

During the war the national park system has been maintained on virtually a custodial basis only. Increased expenditures are required in 1948 to provide the most needed improvements in roads, parkways, buildings and utilities, and for general administration and protection.

Other resource programs of the Department of the Interior will increase by 7 million dollars in 1948. General surveys and topographical mapping activities by the Geological Survey must be accelerated to provide basic data needed for natural resources programs and industrial development. Expenditures for conservation and development of fish and wildlife resources reflect a small increase in operating costs.

Some progress has been made in the development of Alaska, but only a beginning. Included in several of these programs are expenditures for the investigation and development of the natural resources of this vast area.

Appropriations: Appropriations of 779 million dollars for resource development in the fiscal year 1948 include an estimated supplemental of 4 million dollars for the Forest Service. The total is substantially below estimated expenditures for that year. Postponement of some of the public works projects for flood control and reclamation in the current year will leave available in 1948 substantial balances from earlier-year appropriations. Similarly, the curtailment of other resource development activities has resulted in some carry-over of appropriations for these programs. A smaller amount from 1948 appropriations will be available to finance expenditures in later years.

In the case of the Atomic Energy Commission, the Budget recommendation includes contract authority in the amount of 250 million dollars in addition to the 250 million dollars of recommended appropriations. The appropriations to discharge obligations under this contract authority will be made in future years when the payments become due.

Transportation and communication

Six years of deferred maintenance and improvement must be made up before the basic postwar needs of motor and water transportation are met. The highway system, particularly, has fallen far behind the standards which should prevail under conditions of rapidly growing use. Urban congestion is again becoming a serious problem. Likewise, the enormous expansion of civil aviation since VJ-day has thrown an increasing burden upon inadequate airway and airport facilities. An expanded program is essential if undue hazards in the air are to be avoided and if the development of aviation is to continue without serious technical impediment. At the same time it is hoped to restore prewar service standards in the postal service. The enforcement of regulatory standards, particularly those designed for accident prevention in all types of transport, should be restored, at least to prewar levels.

It is the policy of the Government to withdraw from ship operation as rapidly as possible and to dispose of vessels in a manner that will promote a large and effective merchant fleet under our flag. But, since private operators see little prospect of profit in the coastwise trade and much of the overseas traffic is regarded as temporary, Government operations have continued. The Maritime Commission reconversion program, the lay-up of vessels in the reserve fleet, and the preparation of war-built vessels for sale are under way.

Expenditures: The Maritime Commission, by its petition before the Interstate Commerce Commission, is attempting to obtain revision of the railroad rate structure in order to permit resumption of domestic shipping under private auspices. We must look to the domestic trade to provide the active core of our merchant fleet reserve, since we cannot hope to maintain in the foreign trade alone a merchant fleet adequate for the Nation's security. Because the long-run needs of foreign trade are not yet clear, the expenditure estimates contemplate only a moderate expansion in operating subsidies. Construction of new vessels is limited to those for which private purchasers are available and those essential to meet specialized needs for which war-built vessels cannot be adapted. I hope that the rate of ship disposition and liquidation of Government operations can be expedited.

Under the War Department are two major functions relating to transportation—the Panama Canal and the rivers and harbors work of the Corps of Engineers. To make up deferred maintenance, to continue at a minimum rate river and harbor construction projects already under way, and to make a slow beginning on projects authorized under the 1947 appropriation it is necessary to expand the expenditures during the fiscal year 1948.

Other aids to navigation are those maintained and operated by the Coast Guard (in the Treasury Department). The large decrease in the fiscal year 1948 reflects the return to a normal program, the completion of previously deferred work during 1947 and early 1948, and some reduction in Coast Guard aviation. In the interest of reducing expenditures, the installation of the Loran system of radio navigation aid will be spread over a number of years.

Most Federal expenditures for highways are concentrated in the Federal-aid program under the Federal Works Agency. This is a matching program in which Federal expenditures depend upon the level of State activity within the authorized annual rate of 500 million dollars established for each of the first three postwar years by the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1944. Materials shortages, contracting difficulties, and high costs have delayed this program, but the situation should ease by next year. Sums apportioned to the States, however, are available only for a year after the close of the fiscal year for which they are authorized, and the rate of expenditure has thus far been well below congressional authorizations. States are, therefore, under pressure to obligate these funds at once. As has been urged by many of the States, it is recommended that the Congress extend for one additional year the period during which these funds may be expended. Moderate increases for the Agriculture and Interior Departments are included to begin to overcome the long deferment of work on the forest roads and trails and Indian roads.

The sharp upward trend in expenditures by the Department of Commerce for civil aviation results from the rapid expansion of the industry. Inadequate facilities and services have caused serious congestion and a threat to air safety. The expansion and modernization of the airways system provided in these estimates is essential for the continued progress of the industry and could not be reduced without great risk.

As the rapid growth of aviation continues, I believe it is unwise to place the entire burden of expanding, improving, and maintaining the airways upon the general taxpayer. Instead, civil aviation should bear a reasonable share. The Department of Commerce is considering the feasibility of various methods to recover part of the expenses from the users.

Substantial expenditures for grants-in-aid to airports under the 1946 legislation are anticipated for the first time, increasing from 7 million dollars in the fiscal year 1947 to 50 million dollars in 1948. This will be channeled as far as possible into urgent work designed to relieve bottlenecks in air transport, but the apportionment formula will limit the discretion of the Civil Aeronautics Administration in scheduling first the most needed projects.

Unless legislative action is taken to revise postal rates, the Post Office deficit threatens to be the largest in history. Mail volume has expanded enormously, but current operating costs have increased even more rapidly. This is the chief cause of the deficit. Further temporary additions to expenditures result from the need to take up deferred maintenance and replace equipment. The Post Office Department is studying its operations with a view to introducing economies. I am instructing the Postmaster General to institute all operating economies consistent with reasonable service and to prepare a comprehensive recommendation for rate revision sufficient to wipe out the deficit.

Appropriations: Appropriations of 1,196 million dollars are included in the Budget for the fiscal year 1948 for "Transportation and communication," compared with estimated expenditures of 1,530 million dollars. Unobligated balances in Maritime Commission revolving funds are adequate for all expenditures with the exception of an appropriation of 6 million dollars recommended for the maritime training fund and aid to State marine schools. War Department and Federal Works Agency appropriations fall below expenditure estimates because of the deferral to 1948 of work for which appropriations were already made in 1947. The appropriations total includes 50 million dollars for the Civil Aeronautics Administration as an estimate of the appropriation request that will be made for the airport program as soon as the plans of the Agency are sufficiently matured. Contract authorizations of 500 million dollars are included for the Federal-aid postwar highway construction program.

Finance, commerce, and industry

By the end of the current fiscal year, almost all wartime controls of business will have ended. I recommend that the Congress extend the authority for rent control; price control on sugar and sirups, and rice; sugar rationing; export and import controls; priority and allocation controls on a few commodities still in extremely short supply; and a few other minimum controls which are indispensable for the time being.

Now that we are returning to a peacetime economy that depends for its success on private enterprise, the Government should resume and expand its services to business, including both financial and nonfinancial aids. In addition, free enterprise depends on positive Government action to preserve competition and control monopolies—proper functions that a democratic government must not neglect.

Expenditures: During the rest of this fiscal year, the Office of Temporary Controls will discontinue as rapidly as possible direct controls over business operations previously administered by the Civilian Production Administration and the Office of Price Administration. Although a few essential controls should be retained a little longer, these, too, will be terminated as soon as conditions permit.

Among the other regulatory agencies, Foreign Funds Control (Treasury) and Solid Fuels Administration (Interior) will also cease operations this year.

The peacetime regulatory agencies, however, must be strengthened from low levels justified during the war by the existence of other direct controls. This Budget, therefore, provides for the necessary increases in such essential agencies as the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Antitrust Division (Justice), and the Tariff Commission.

The Antitrust Division will concentrate its efforts on major violations of the antitrust laws. The Federal Trade Commission will increase its effectiveness by operating on an industry-wide basis, rather than through the slower procedure of individual complaints. It will also sponsor a larger number of industry conferences designed to locate and eliminate unfair trade practices through cooperative action.

In the past year, we have made a fine start in building up the business service programs of the Department of Commerce from their low wartime levels. To provide necessary information for business, provision of funds is recommended for a census of manufactures, already authorized by law, and likewise for a census of business to be authorized by proposed legislation. No census has been taken in either area since 1939 and present information is badly out of date. A small but necessary increase in the business-service activities of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is also recommended. The Patent Office urgently needs increases in personnel to cope with the growing backlog of patent applications and to handle registrations under recent trade-mark legislation.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation estimates assume that repayment of outstanding wartime loans to business enterprises will continue in the fiscal year 1948, but at a slower rate. In its peacetime business-loan program, the Corporation has been authorizing about 1,000 loans a month, chiefly to small business. Ninety percent of them are in amounts of 100,000 dollars or less. The new program also emphasizes guarantees of private credit rather than direct Government loans. These guaranties will not require disbursements in any large amount unless there should be an economic recession. In this event the Reconstruction Finance Corporation stands ready to purchase the loans offered by participating banks.

Since January 1946 the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been administering the loan and lease program of the Smaller War Plants Corporation. Disbursements on previously authorized Smaller War Plants Corporation loans are nearly finished and outstanding loans are gradually being repaid. In the fiscal year 1948 the Reconstruction Finance Corporation plans to retire an estimated 100 million dollars in Smaller War Plants Corporation capital stock.

The War Damage Corporation, a Reconstruction Finance Corporation subsidiary, which at its peak had a total of 140 billion dollars of war damage insurance in force, is also terminating its operations. By 1948 it will be in full liquidation. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been directed to return to the Treasury the 210 million dollars of net profits from this operation.

The expenditures of 310 million dollars for retirement of Smaller War Plants Corporation capital and return of War Damage Corporation profits will be paid into miscellaneous receipts and thus have no net effect on the total Budget. With these transfer items eliminated, the net increase of expenditures under this function in 1948 is ?3 million dollars.

Federal and State bank supervisory authorities are making special efforts to encourage banks and insurance companies to complete repayment of their prewar obligations to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. By June 30, 1948, the outstanding volume of such loans and investments will be down to 100 million dollars out of a total of about 3.5 billion dollars disbursed since 1932.

With stock-market activity and new security issues far above wartime levels, the Securities and Exchange Commission requires additional funds to rebuild its depleted staff and thus provide more adequate protection for the millions of investors.

Appropriations: To finance the expenditures for these programs, estimated appropriations in the fiscal year 1948 of 116 million dollars include anticipated additional appropriations of 53 million dollars required by proposed extension of the existing authority of the Office of Temporary Controls and the authority of the Department of Commerce to control exports. They also include 14 million dollars for new censuses under proposed new legislation.

Labor

The facilities of the Federal Government for dealing with the welfare of labor and with labor-management disputes provide for the encouragement of collective bargaining, administration of laws and regulations to protect the working force, assistance to States in promoting employment opportunities, and gathering of basic labor information.

In my message on the State of the Union, I have asked that the machinery in the Department of Labor for facilitating collective bargaining and expediting the settlement of labor-management disputes be amplified and strengthened. I have included administrative funds for this purpose under proposed legislation.

I recommend also that the Congress authorize grants to States through the Department of Labor for programs fostering safe working conditions. The toll resulting from industrial hazards reduces the productive capacity of the labor force. The new program should be administered by State departments of labor under Federal standards. Funds for this purpose have likewise been included under proposed legislation.

Labor information and statistics and general administration	8	12	14	14

Expenditures: The National Labor Relations Board has an accumulation of unresolved cases awaiting action owing to the increased incidence of representation cases and unfair labor-practice cases and to the reduced appropriations available for the Board's work this year. Delay in settling such cases is in itself a cause of labor disturbance. Apart from the backlog of unsettled cases, the number of cases brought before the Board for settlement has increased. The program submitted in this Budget is designed to reduce the backlog and keep the Board more nearly current in handling cases. This should diminish the incidence of strike action by labor organizations which is encouraged by tardy handling of cases.

The public employment service system, although now composed of the coordinated employment office facilities of the several States, is still financed in full by the Federal Government. Expenditures for these offices for the fiscal year 1947 are estimated at 90 million dollars. This includes the increased cost of State operation and 11 million dollars of nonrecurring terminal-leave pay for Federal employees upon the return of the employment service to the States. It is my hope that the public employment service system will maintain the high standard of operations and the efficient procedures which have proved essential for facilitating the flow of workers to areas where they are needed.

I propose also increased expenditures for labor information and statistics to facilitate collective bargaining and meet the more important needs of labor, business, Government, and the general public for current data concerning employment, wages, prices, and the like.

Appropriations: For 1948 I recommend appropriations of 118 million dollars, including the amount for proposed legislation.

General government

The principal types of expenditures in "General government" are for (1) legislative and judicial activities, and executive management and control; (2) the Government payment toward civilian employees' retirement; (3) other services covered by appropriations which relate to more than one function; and (4) a few special programs necessitated by the war, such as disposal of surplus property, which do not logically belong in any other category.

Expenditures for these functions in the fiscal year 1948 are expected to decline only moderately from the comparable total for 1947, because they will still include a substantial amount for war liquidation. Such activities will account for more than one-third of all the expenditures in this category.

Expenditures: The work load of the Treasury Department remains at a high level. For example, in the Bureau of Internal Revenue tax returns for previous years remain to be audited, pending excess-profits-tax cases must be investigated and settled, special efforts are continuing to reduce tax evasion, and the number of tax returns to be reviewed is increasing as war veterans revert to civilian status. Further, with the resumption of foreign trade and passenger travel and the designation of new airfields in the United States and Alaska as ports of entry, the staff requirements of the Bureau of Customs are above the level of 1946.

The Government payment toward the Federal civilian employees' general retirement system will be larger in the fiscal year 1948 than in the current year. About half of the increase reflects the advance in salary rates which took effect July 1, 1946, and was not covered in the appropriation for 1947. The remainder of the increase applies against previous liabilities of the Government to the retirement system.

The surplus property disposal program, under the War Assets Administration, is at its peak during the current fiscal year. Henceforth, it will be tapering off, but disposal will be relatively more difficult as Government stocks of scarce items are reduced and as civilian production increases. The statutory provisions governing the sale of surplus property which give preference to certain groups of purchasers have greatly complicated the disposal program, slowing down sales and augmenting administrative costs to such an extent that Congress might well reconsider these provisions. The expenditures of the War Assets Administration cover only part of the handling of surplus property; many other Federal agencies participate in this program. The proceeds from sales of surplus property are included in miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury.

The return of war dead from overseas is a civil function of the War Department which is just getting under way. The total cost of this program is estimated at 234 million dollars. Efforts will be made to complete this work in the next 2 years.

Public buildings construction programs of the Federal Works Agency will remain at a low level, but certain expenditures for repair and maintenance of buildings cannot be delayed. Together with expenses for current operation of the buildings, these constitute a sizable portion of "General government" expenditures.

Appropriations: The appropriation total of 1,341 million dollars for the fiscal year 1948 includes 75 million dollars for anticipated supplemental appropriations. The total is well below the estimated expenditures, mainly because the War Assets Administration will be paying obligations incurred against earlier appropriations.

Interest on the public debt

The volume of interest payments on the public debt reflects the magnitude and composition of the debt, as well as the level of interest rates. As long as prosperity permits, our objective should be a steady retirement in the outstanding debt. Interest rates will be kept at present low levels through continued cooperation between the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve System.

	Actual, 1946	Estimate, 1947	Estimate, 1948
Treasury Department	$4,748	$4,950	$5,000	$5,000

The estimated increase of 50 million dollars in interest payments in 1948 over 1947 is due principally to (1) increased interest payments on the larger volume of special issues held by trust funds which pay relatively high rates; (2) increased accruals on savings bonds, owing to a large volume of bonds reaching higher accrual brackets; and (3) the change from semiannual to annual payment of interest on certificates of indebtedness, effective September 1, 1946. The net effect of these factors has been to increase interest costs in 1948, even though the debt has been declining since its peak on February 28, 1946.

Interest payments are made on the basis of a permanent appropriation. The amount shown under recommended appropriations is equal to the estimated expenditures.

Refunds of receipts

Tax refunds will be a large item in the Budget for some years to come, largely because of overpayment of individual income tax under the current payment system and settlement of the wartime income- and profits-tax liabilities of corporations. The overpayments made each year under the current payment system are in the main refunded during each immediately succeeding year. The refunds to corporations, attributable to wartime-tax liabilities, will be spread over the next several years because of the time required to effect final settlement in many cases where the various carry-back and other relief provisions are applicable. If the war excise-tax rates are continued, refunds in 1948 will be 123 million dollars lower.

CIVIL PUBLIC WORKS

In the Budget, construction projects are listed in the programs which they serve. In total the expenditures for civil public works are estimated at 2.1 billion dollars in 1948 compared with 1.7 billion dollars in 1947. These are discussed in detail in part IV.

Federal public works provide capital assets from which the Nation derives benefits over a long period of time. During the past decade the responsibility of the Federal Government, both directly and through grants to the States, has increased. Public construction is essential to our veterans, natural resources, transportation, social welfare, and housing.

Construction programs have to be scheduled over a number of years. The work done in any one year is largely controlled by legislation and appropriations in prior years. For these reasons the program for 1948 is larger than that for 1947. While curtailment orders in August 1946 slowed down the program, they could not alter the trends already established by legislation.

The recommendations for the fiscal year 1948 for grant and loan programs allow those programs to continue at rates consistent with the authorizing legislation.

Direct Federal construction of long-term projects will be confined to those for which appropriations have already been made. Short-term projects such as provision of national-park facilities, forest roads and trails, and institutional facilities will be limited to those of an urgent character.

The Budget contemplates the construction at a conservative rate of all projects for flood control, navigation, and reclamation for which initial appropriations were made in prior years. It does not provide initial appropriations for any new projects under these three programs. Even so, expenditures will be greater in the fiscal year 1949 than in 1948.

This upward trend in public construction deserves careful consideration by the Congress.

This Budget reflects the continuing decline in Federal civilian employment. Federal agencies have reduced their civilian personnel to 2,300,000—including those in the Territories and possessions and in foreign countries—from a wartime peak of 3,770,000 in June 1945. The Budget estimates contemplate further reductions.

Total civilian personnel of the War and Navy Departments is far below the wartime peak. Personnel in the emergency war agencies has been cut drastically except in the War Assets Administration, which is at the height of its work.

Three agencies—the Veterans' Administration, the Post Office, and the Treasury—together have almost as many employees as the 1939 total of 900,000 for the whole Federal Government. Personnel requirements of the Veterans' Administration are large because it must administer a great variety of programs for millions of veterans. The rise in the number of postal employees reflects the growth of the population and the even larger increase of business and industry. Increased employment in the Treasury results mainly from the greater complexity and coverage of the tax system and the wide distribution of public-debt ownership.

Total employment in all the other Government departments and agencies combined is lower than in June 1945 even though certain functions of emergency war agencies have been returned to the peacetime agencies from which they were transferred and other permanent functions have been added.

The personnel reductions were facilitated by the statutory limitations on personnel and provisions for detailed personnel ceiling determinations enacted by the Seventy-ninth Congress. When we began to convert to a peacetime basis and appropriations greatly exceeded expenditures, this legislation served a useful purpose. By the Legislative Reorganization Act the Congress has in effect decided that the extent of Federal activities, and hence personnel, should be determined by the usual appropriations process. The statutory limitations and personnel ceilings constitute a separate and possibly conflicting method of controlling the number of employees. The appropriations process, to my mind, is far preferable to the personnel ceilings and limitations, since these place undue emphasis upon the number of employees and put a premium on contractual arrangements and other measures to get the necessary work done without exceeding numerical limitations.

I therefore recommend the repeal of the statutory limitations on personnel and provisions for personnel ceiling determinations.

GOVERNMENT CORPORATIONS

With the termination of wartime programs, net expenditures of corporations in the fiscal year 1948 will be focused in a few major areas—chiefly purchase of veterans' housing mortgages, loans to finance rural electrification, price-support outlays for farm commodities, and disbursements on Export-Import Bank loans to foreign borrowers. These programs represent, in the main, capital items recoverable over a period of years. As long as high levels of business activity continue, disbursements in all other major areas will be held to low levels and will be partly or wholly offset by receipts.

In the fiscal year 1948 net expenditures from corporation accounts alone will amount to 829 million dollars, compared with net receipts of 175 million dollars in 1947. But if we take into account reduced payments by the Treasury to the corporations and increased repayment of capital funds to the Treasury by the corporations, net withdrawals from the Treasury for these programs will remain almost unchanged, despite the sharp shift in the methods of financing them. This is explained in detail in the summary narrative for part III.

At present certain wholly owned Government corporations have authority to issue obligations whose principal and interest are guaranteed by the Federal Government. During the war the Treasury, because of its tremendous public debt operations, requested the corporations to obtain their funds directly from it rather than issue obligations on the market. I now recommend that the authority of Government corporations to issue guaranteed obligations to the public be repealed and that such agencies be authorized to obtain their funds solely by borrowing from the Secretary of the Treasury.

During the war, the Treasury has been advancing funds to the corporations at an interest rate of 1 percent. This low rate was based in part on the general level of interest rates in the market and in part on the fact that a large proportion of corporation activities—like subsidies and preclusive buying—was non-income-producing.

From now on most corporation programs will be revenue-producing. Accordingly, I recommend that corporations be required to reimburse the Treasury for the full cost to it of money advanced to the corporations. Interest paid on borrowings from the Treasury should be based upon the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States—now about 1.8 percent. Dividends should be paid on capital stock, if earned. While these changes in the amount of intragovernmental transactions will not affect the Budget deficit or surplus, they will cause the corporations' records to reflect more nearly the true costs of their operations.

I recommend that the statutory authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be extended beyond the present expiration date of June 30, 1947. Such extension is assumed in the expenditure estimates in this Budget. The new charter to be submitted will provide for the repeal of all powers not required for peacetime activities. It will also provide for a reduction of 2.5 billion dollars in the Corporation's borrowing authority. With the receipts anticipated from liquidation of war activities the reduced authority should prove adequate.

I have already recommended extension of the authority of the U. S. Commercial Company and reduction in the borrowing authority of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation.

In this Budget, I am also recommending return of capital to the Treasury by certain mixed-ownership corporations. The Federal land banks will complete retirement of Government-owned capital stock during the fiscal year 1947. In the fiscal year 1948, it appears that they can repay the outstanding paid-in surplus of 37 million dollars. These transactions will return the land banks to the status of cooperative institutions owned by the farmers they serve. In addition, I recommend a further small retirement of the capital stock of the Federal home loan banks.

The Corporation Supplement to the 1947 Budget indicated that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation could soon begin to retire its capital stock. The continuing rapid growth in the Corporation's resources and the exceptionally strong position of the insured banks now make it possible to propose a substantial amount of capital redemption in the fiscal year 1948. Accordingly, I recommend that the Congress authorize the Corporation to repay all of the 139 million dollars of capital furnished by the Federal Reserve System. Since the Reserve banks have already replaced these funds from earnings in recent years, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System has proposed that the Congress at the same time authorize the payment to the Treasury of the 139 million dollars. I also recommend that the Congress authorize the Corporation to repay 100 million dollars of the 150 million dollars furnished by the Treasury Department.

By the close of the fiscal year 1948, after these repayments, the Corporation will still have capital surplus and reserves of about 1 billion dollars—the objective set several years ago.

The Board of Governors has made a further recommendation, in which I also concur, that the Congress repeal the existing, largely dormant, authority of the Federal Reserve banks to make direct loans to industry, releasing to the Treasury the funds reserved for this purpose. The gold increment fund now includes 112 million dollars reserved for such loans, and an added 28 million dollars has been advanced to the Federal Reserve banks. These sums will be transferred to miscellaneous receipts.

These transfers from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Reserve banks, and the gold increment fund will add a total of 379 million dollars in miscellaneous receipts in the fiscal year 1948.

The Government Corporation Control Act requires that no wholly owned Government corporation not now possessing a Federal charter shall continue after June 30, 1948, unless reincorporated before that time by act of Congress. Of the 16 such corporations in operation when the act was approved, the following 6 are already in process of liquidation: Defense Homes Corporation, Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, Inter-American Navigation Corporation, Institute of Inter-American Transportation, Prencinradio, and the U. S. Spruce Production Corporation.

This Budget recommends the liquidation of five other State-chartered corporations: Inter-American Educational Foundation, The RFC Mortgage Company, Rubber Development Corporation, Tennessee Valley Associated Cooperatives, and the Warrior River Terminal Company. The residual functions of the Rubber Development Corporation and the program of The RFC Mortgage Company will be assumed by their parent corporation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Warrior River Terminal Company will be absorbed by the Inland Waterways Corporation, of which it is now a subsidiary.

This Budget also recommends that three nonfederally chartered corporations be reincorporated by act of Congress: Commodity Credit Corporation, Export-Import Bank of Washington, and the Virgin Islands Company. The act establishing the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the United States expires in June. It, therefore, needs early consideration.

Recommendations on the Panama Railroad Company and the Institute of Inter-American Affairs have necessarily been postponed. The Department of State is reviewing the program of the Institute and a recommendation regarding its future status will be forthcoming soon.

Activities of the Panama Railroad Company have become closely interwoven with those of the Panama Canal in the 42 years since the Government purchased this Company. While its major functions obviously must be continued, a careful reexamination and reappraisal of the respective roles of the Company and the Panama Canal are required. As soon as studies are completed, my recommendations will be transmitted to the Congress.

In addition to examination of the nonfederally chartered corporations, studies are under way, in accordance with the provisions of section 107 of the Government Corporation Control Act, regarding those corporations whose fiscal affairs could be handled more appropriately in the same manner as those of regular Federal agencies. These and future studies will be useful, not only in developing recommendations concerning specific corporations, but also in establishing a consistent pattern for use of Government corporations.

While the general role of the Government corporation has been accepted in the laws of this country for more than 30 years, the standards for use of this instrument are not fully developed and will be subject to many refinements. Experience indicates that the corporate form of organization is peculiarly adapted to the administration of governmental programs which are predominantly of a commercial character—those which are revenue-producing, are at least potentially self-sustaining, and involve a large number of business-type transactions with the public.

In their business operations such programs require greater flexibility than the customary type of appropriation budget ordinarily permits. As a rule the usefulness of a corporation lies in its ability to deal with the public in the manner employed by private business for similar work. Necessary controls are or can be provided under the Government Corporation Control Act. Further study may well indicate not only that some existing corporations ought to be converted into agencies, but also that some existing agencies might administer their programs more effectively if they had some or all of the attributes of corporations.

In this message every effort has been made to present the Federal Budget program with as much clarity as its complexities permit. All citizens have an interest in the Budget. Both sides of the Budget touch their everyday lives. I consider it my duty to give them full information on what their Government proposes to do.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

JANUARY 3, 1947.

Mr. RANKIN (interrupting the reading of the message). Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that this message is a very long document and will take considerable time to read. I therefore ask unanimous consent that further reading of the message be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels that we should read the communication from the President.

(The Clerk concluded the reading of the message.)

GOVERNMENT FINANCES

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, when our national security, or our internal security, or our way of life is challenged or is in jeopardy, the membership of the House of Representatives may be depended upon to put aside partisanship and cooperate for the public good.

There is abundant ground for that assertion in the annals of days gone by. In the words of Lord Byron, "The best prophet of the future is the past."

The people of the United States in their wisdom—or lack of wisdom—by their vote last November transferred the stewardship of the Nation and the control of the national legislative branch of the Government to the Republican Party. In our new status as the minority party of the House, the Democratic membership may be relied upon to support and aid in the enactment of measures which manifestly would promote the general welfare. That would be in keeping with the party's consistent record down through the years for initiating and enacting legislation of benefit to all the people.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, cooperation is not a one-sided thing. The head of our Government, a stanch Missouri Democrat, continues as President of all the people and a very large proportion of our people continue by choice to be represented by Democratic Senators and Representatives. Those of us in the National Legislature have responsibilities to those who send us here. The President has a responsibility to all the people which our Republican friends must recognize.

Our stewardship for the last 14 years is replete with accomplishments in the interest of all the people. We point to them with a deep sense of satisfaction and it will be our purpose to preserve the structure we have built and to strengthen it and make additions to it in such ways as may point to further progress and national betterment.

We took over the conduct of the Government in 1933 when it was tottering on the edge of a precipice. We found chaos and we leave prosperity. We have preserved the American way of life. We found half our banks in bankruptcy and we are leaving the most stable banking system men have ever created. We found farm prices below the cost of production and leave them at the highest level in history. We found old age in destitution and leave it in comfort and security. We found labor unemployed and hopeless, and today jobs are going begging. We found America facing the greatest military menace in history and leave it the foremost Nation in the world.

We just listened, Mr. Speaker, to the President's Budget message. It is a forthright presentation of the Nation's financial status, actual and projected, so far as projection is practical at this time. It is a further evidence of the determination of the Democratic Party to bring the cost of government down to the lowest level consistent with outlays occasioned or required by law, contractual obligations, and expenditure objects which would be unwise from a public-spirited standpoint to ignore or defer at this time.

It is with a considerable sense of pride that we point to the rapid reduction in the rate of expenditure brought about by our party since the cessation of hostilities. Bear in mind that the Japanese war was going on but 17 months ago. The fiscal year which ended June 30, 1946, 6 months ago, was partly a war year. Despite this pressing situation, expenditures dropped in that year from a prior $100,000,000,000 ceiling to $65,000,000,000. This year the outlook is for a total of $42,500,000,000. For 1948, commencing July 1, the President projects a total of $37,500,000,000, which will be within the estimated receipts with a relatively small margin for debt retirement.

In his address to this body on the opening day of the session, our new Speaker said:

> We must, after 17 long years, balance the budget and commence paying off the national debt.

There is an implication there that the Republican Party is proposing to start something, which as a matter of fact, has already been started. Certainly there is no mention or commendation of the unprecedented accomplishments already achieved. That was, to say the least, hardly a premise on which to invite cooperation.

The party newly coming into power cannot hope to equal in this session of Congress, either in percentages or in total amounts reclaimed, the retrenchments and rescissions effected by the party in power in the last session.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that on this side of the aisle we will continue, as far as we are permitted, the retrenchment program which we promptly inaugurated upon the cessation of hostilities, and we will contribute every support to the further development of that program where it is evident that such course would be in the public interest.

Let me add that our past record would have been a better one had we had the kind of support we are being solicited now to give. I recall some very large savings that would have ensued had our friends on that side of the aisle, following our lead, refused funds for proposed construction of a number of naval ships that Bikini rendered obsolete; riding over the committee roughshod when we advocated deferment of undertaking the prosecution of a number of river and harbor projects; and other proposals for unwarranted expenditures.

When you have an economy objective, Members must subordinate local interest to national interest. You will not get anywhere unless you do, and if that policy had prevailed during the last session you would be confronted today with a smaller budget than is submitted by the President in the message just received.

However, it has been the policy of the Appropriations Committee from its inception to examine estimates of appropriations and to cut them wherever a cut seemed to be justified. You will find the Democratic members of the committee ready to continue that course. Manifestly the field for application of the knife is limited. Do not look at totals for agencies. If you examine their component parts, you can better understand the problem. Of course, you can cut indiscriminately to arrive at a predetermined ceiling either with the determination to hold to such reduced amounts or with the idea of providing supplemental amounts later.

I trust there will be no disposition to wink at any disregard of the antideficiency law. There is such a law, and it has teeth in it. Indiscriminate cuts, in view of that law, can prove disastrous.

We shall not be a party to that sort of retrenchment.

The immediate aim of our Republican brethren, we are told, is tax reduction. Last summer my good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], announced on the floor here in a colloquy during the debate on the last appropriations bill that he would sponsor a 50-percent tax slash.

I notice now in the newspapers that he has come down a little. He has dropped from 50 percent to 20 percent, apparently.

Speaker MARTIN tells us, and I quote from his very notable address:

> We intend to reduce tax rates whenever and as promptly as it is feasible to do so. We have given that promise to the American people and we intend that it shall be fulfilled.

That sounds a little better; it is somewhat more reserved than some earlier utterances.

> We intend to reduce tax rates whenever and as promptly as it is feasible to do so.

That sounds much more statesmanlike, more prudent, although there is a world of latitude in that word "feasible."

Speaking as one Democrat, I am for reducing tax rates whenever and as promptly as such course would appear to be in the public interest. I shall need much persuasion, however, to support any move that would reduce the Federal income at this critical time. Our public debt is today above $259,000,000,000—such a debt as was never carried by any nation at any period in the history of the world. I am not one of those who believes that it should be passed on to generations a hundred years hence with the possibility of superimpostion thereon of many more billions of dollars.

Speaker MARTIN tells us:

> The debt into which this Nation has been plunged is of such magnitude that it cannot be paid off in more than a century.

That is a frightening statement, it is a disheartening statement; a statement fraught with implications which should alarm all thinking Americans. God grant that America may never again become involved in war; and God grant that America shall never again find herself in such dire financial stress as the Democrats found the Treasury when they completely assumed the reins of government in 1933.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. What assurances under the proposed program that has been announced here through the newspapers in the last few days is there that such a situation will not recur?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I think the gentleman ought also to include the fact that in 1930 we had only $4,426,000,000 in circulation. The last Treasury report I have is dated October 31, 1946. It shows that the amount of money in circulation at that time, instead of being $4,426,000,000, was $28,600,120,086. Therefore, when you talk about the national debt and compare it with the national debt in former years you should take into consideration the depreciation of the value of the dollar and the inflation of the currency as it now exists.

Mr. CANNON. The statement of the gentleman from Mississippi emphasizes the significance of the situation.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can the gentleman state the total amount of the rescission bills we passed during the last Congress?

Mr. CANNON. They were in excess of $64,000,000,000, an amount unprecedented in the annals of any American war.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask further, Is this practice of passing such rescission bills a new practice or has that been done earlier in our legislative history?

Mr. CANNON. It has not been done before to the amount or with the promptness with which we acted in the last Congress. After the last war a smaller amount was recaptured following the termination of hostilities. In this war we incorporated in the appropriation bills a provision that the Budget Bureau should submit periodically information upon which to base such rescissions, and promptly on the capitulation of the Japanese, members of our committee were called back and proceeded without the loss of time with a program which resulted in the salvaging of this unprecedented amount of $64,000,000,000. No committee could have proceeded with more celerity or more effectiveness.

It behooves us, therefore, to liquidate the present debt whenever and as promptly as the people's welfare will permit. I personally feel that the time is not opportune deliberately to lessen income and that it is in the Nation's interest to employ any surplus it may be practical to build up in the reduction of this enormous debt.

It cannot be repeated too often that the debt is costing us five billion annually in interest alone and that interest is at a remarkably low rate, the lowest rate at which Government expenditures of that character were ever funded. What will it be when large-scale refunding operations become necessary? Between January 1, 1950, and December 31, 1954, $38,880,000,000 of 2-percent bonds will mature.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will it be possible to refund that amount of money at 2 percent? The day is coming when replacement issues for maturing securities will have to be made sufficiently attractive to interest those who have funds to invest. We shall not be in a market influenced by victory drives and a national spirit of sacrifice for boys waging war in distant lands. It is entirely conceivable that replacement issues may have to be made tax-exempt, or marketed at a sufficiently attractive discount, in order that maturing obligations may be met. The potentialities are many and run to extremes disturbing to contemplate.

From whence comes the urge for an immediate tax reduction? Our people were never better circumstanced. The banks are surfeited with deposits. At the end of August $63,200,000,000 of interest-bearing public debt was owned by individuals. Wages are at top levels. Employment is at top levels. Business at present and prospectively has never been excelled in times of peace. Does not that all point to the wisdom of making as much inroad upon the public debt as existing sources of income may permit as long as such a healthy state of affairs obtains?

I submit that a contrary course is fraught with danger and should not be embarked upon until the potentialities pro and con have been thoroughly explored. This is not a political or a party question. It is a question of grave general national concern, not alone as regards the present but as regards many tomorrows.

So, I say to my Republican friends, we shall be glad to cooperate with you in the furtherance of programs and policies initiated by Democratic Chief Executives and Democratic Congresses, and to join with you in all economy measures which have firm foundations, and which in our judgment, will best promote the interests of the Republic and the people as a whole.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LYNCH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GORDON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include a letter from Mr. Wells relating to the coming Polish elections.

Mr. JENSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the Washington Times-Herald of November 30.

Mr. CRAWFORD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement appearing in the Financial Chronicle, of New York.

SERGEANT AT ARMS OFFICE ACCOUNTS

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the House Members have received from Mr. Shotwell, senior investigator of the General Accounting Office, a statement similar to the one which I now hold before me, asking us to verify the accounts, or whatever we might owe to the Sergeant at Arms Office.

In discussing this form with the General Accounting Office I have made some suggestions with respect to the wording of the form. It is customary, of course, for a group of auditors to send to the creditors or debtors of a firm a figure which the creditor or debtor can verify. In this case no figure was submitted. So I think we, as Members of the House, can expedite the work and bring about the opening of the office much sooner if we will take our last statement received prior to January 3, 1947, and then add to that the January 3 credits of $833.33 and $208.33 and deduct such outstanding checks as we have, and then send the verified figure to the General Accounting Office without delay. That is one way to avoid the necessity of the General Accounting Office having to send us another statement. What they should have done, of course, was to give us a figure to work from, but on account of conditions prevailing, they did not do that. Now we have to build our own figure if we are to hurry the work along.

MEETING OF THE WAR VETERAN CONGRESSMEN

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to advise the Members of the House that on Monday next, at 10 o'clock in the morning, there will be a meeting held in this Chamber for the veterans of all wars who are Members of the House of Representatives at this time. It will cover those from the Spanish-American War, World War I, and World War II.

The purpose of this meeting is for the reactivation or reorganization of a veterans' group which has been organized in this House since World War I. May I say that this meeting, or any meetings which are held in the future, will be entirely nonpolitical, and they will be wholly social in character and for educational purposes. Recently—and I think it appeared in one of the papers last night—the press purported to claim that this was intended as a veterans' bloc. There is nothing of that kind or character intended. This will be a social organization entirely. This will not be a veterans' bloc in any respect.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. I am very glad the gentleman has made this statement, particularly with reference to the published stories about the formation of some sort of bloc. I am quite sure the last thing the gentleman from Indiana would have in mind would be that some pressure operation was contemplated.

Mr. SPRINGER. No pressure operation is contemplated, it will not be a veterans' bloc, and we will not operate as a bloc. It is entirely social in character and nature. Each veteran member will vote his own independent determination upon each measure presented.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. May I say to the gentleman from Indiana that the Veterans' Association is already in existence. I believe the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] is the chairman.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is right. Major Bulwinkle is the present chairman of the veterans' group.

Mr. RANKIN. It has been in existence ever since the last war. It is nonpolitical, being purely social in its nature.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. I agree with what the gentleman has said. The meeting should be nonpartisan, and it should so organize as not to interfere with the normal functioning of House committees. To that extent, veterans have a common interest that we can serve by mutual education. I hope every veteran will attend the meeting Monday at 10 a. m.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is entirely correct. Remember the time, Monday morning next, at 10 o'clock, in this chamber. All are invited.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PLOESER (at the request of Mr. CURTIS) was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include Report of the Special Committee of the St. Louis Airport Commission.

Mr. PLOESER (at the request of Mr. CURTIS) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, of January 7, 1947.

Mr. FORAND asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. POULSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two articles on the subject of taxes.

Mr. STEFAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech by Judge Prettyman.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore granted, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the National Labor Relations Act commonly known as the Wagner Act has been in force since 1935. Under the interpretation of that act by the NLRB and the courts the causes of labor disputes have increased rather than diminished as have strikes, until over the country there has swept a wave of indignation and protest which can no longer be ignored by the Congress.

Not only have employers protested but the presidents of the three major labor organizations—Mr. Green, of the A. F. of L.; Mr. Murray, of the CIO; Mr. Lewis, formerly affiliated with the A. F. of L., then with the CIO, then with the United Mine Workers and now back again with the A. F. of L.—have all on occasion characterized the interpretation and the administration of the act as arbitrary and unfair, as tending to create labor unrest. The people now demand the repeal of the Wagner Act.

Those who understand labor's problems still believe in collective bargaining but they insist that the right of the unorganized workers, who far outnumber those who are organized, shall be protected.

They further insist that the rights of the public are paramount, cannot be destroyed in order to advance the interest of minority groups, without endangering the foundations of the Republic.

Hence, the bill today is introduced to repeal the Wagner Act and to enact equitable, basic legislation.

Permit me briefly to recite some of the reasons for the repeal of the Wagner Act, for the enactment of labor legislation and to clarify by question and answer some of the provisions of the bill. The abuses perpetrated, not by workers, employees, nor friends of labor but by racketeers who have taken advantage of the situation, who are injuring the causes of labor, and by a few politicians who hope through false promises to profit individually by assuming to act as spokesmen for labor, must be brought to an end.

What the bill which will be introduced on Monday attempts to do is to provide a remedy for lock-outs, slow-downs, work stoppages, and strikes which lessen production, disturb the economic structure, injuriously affect the public health, safety, and welfare.

The Labor Department reports that during the first 11 months of 1946, 107,475,000 man-days of productive work were lost through strikes, while during the preceding year strikes caused the loss of but 38,025,000 man-days. The Wagner law is not a remedy; it has not lessened labor disputes nor removed their causes. It has created and fostered an extra-legal tax-collecting—initiation fees and dues—agency.

Recently labor unions have filed lawsuits asking for the payment by employers to employees of something over $3,000,000,000 for so-called overtime spent, not in productive work, but in going to or from the place of employment or in preparation for productive work.

The demands are for billions of dollars which employers never expected to pay; which the employees never expected to be paid.

The suits grow out of judicial legislation promulgated by certain members of the United States Supreme Court; are inspired in many instances by racketeering labor leaders, unscrupulous lawyers and, no doubt in some cases by Communists who desire to wreck America.

A few of the demands presented may have been made by workers who have rendered services during overtime hours, for compensation to which they are justly entitled. Such actions are very few in number and the amounts involved are relatively small.

Differences of opinion involving questions of public policy which affect the national interest cannot be settled by legislation which is inequitable; which does not at least attempt to mete out justice to all.

Such differences of opinion, unless remedied by just legislation fairly interpreted by the courts, where the issues are vital and an inequitable solution may ruin one large segment of our population, may, as did the question of slavery, involve us in civil strife.

Permitting the issue to drift until such a result comes upon us is unthinkable. Labor disputes, with their attendant strikes, accompanied by the massed picket line, violence, destruction of property, and rioting, may, unless we now find the answer, ultimately involve us in civil war.

To remove the causes of labor disputes, to establish equality of bargaining power between employees and employers, the National Labor Relations Act—the Wagner Act—was passed in 1935. Unfortunately, that act made no effort to mete out equal justice to those required to bargain, to those compelled to work together. It carried no protection for the public.

Privileges without responsibility were given employees and labor organizations, while liabilities, penalties, and responsibility, together with a restriction on long-established customary industrial practices and procedure, were imposed upon employers.

While the act protected employees against employers, it gave individual employees no protection whatever against labor racketeers or their own officials.

The act was so unfair, its interpretation so one-sided, that not only did employers and the public complain, but, on occasion, President Green of the A. F. of L., Murray of the CIO, and Lewis of the United Mine Workers, bitterly condemned it and its administration.

The special privileges granted by the act were so abused, it was so erroneously interpreted, so maladministered that all too often the public health, safety, and welfare were imperiled.

Public sentiment, the public good, now demand the repeal of the National Labor Relations Act.

The security of the worker, the freedom and prosperity of the people, the welfare of the Nation demand the enactment and enforcement of over-all basic labor legislation safeguarding the interests of the man who must work if he would eat, of the employer who must have a profit if he creates and holds open a job, of the citizen who is not a party to a labor dispute.

To accomplish those purposes, this bill is offered without pride of authorship—with the hope that it may be considered on its merits—and prove to be the much-needed, long-sought, remedy.

This is the first attempt to in one bill advance and protect the interests of all parties affected by labor disputes and strikes—the employee—the employer and the innocent citizen who all too often is trampled by the warring contestants.

The concept underlying this bill is one which has been long awaited in many quarters. It proceeds upon the theory that labor has grown up, and should no longer be permitted to continue as the "tough boy" of society, disregard the welfare of the public. Having grown up it should take its place as a responsible member of the American family, and like industry, assume responsibility, be kept within appropriate bounds.

This the bill accomplishes, by making employee and labor organizations equally responsible with industry and employers for the perpetration of any unfair labor practice. It makes both labor and industry amenable to the courts, which under the Norris-LaGuardia and Wagner Acts, virtually refused to impose any restraint upon the activities of labor, no matter how shocking to the conscience or detrimental to the public interest or to the interest of labor those activities may have been.

Under the bill, the Federal courts are empowered to make any order or judgment, either preliminary or final, which is necessary to promote industrial harmony, protect the public and to do justice in any particular case or controversy. Nuisance suits filed either by an employee, a labor organization, or by an employer, a wide-spread practice under the Wagner Act bitterly complained of by industry, are placed under a salutary restraint. The courts are authorized to award attorneys' fees as well as legal costs to the prevailing party in any controversy arising under the act. Nuisance suits would, therefore, subject their sponsors to the obligation of paying their intended victims' court costs and attorneys' fees.

The bill also provides that whenever a plaintiff has himself been guilty of an unfair labor practice related to the controversy, the court shall render judgment dismissing his complaint as such practice constitutes a complete defense. This provision will insure that either employee or employer invoking the jurisdiction of a court must come in with "clean hands."

The National Labor Relations Board created by the Wagner Act is abolished and a new Board is created which is designated as the National Labor Mediation Board. The section authorizing the creation of the Mediation Board provides that it should be composed of three members, the initial terms of whom shall be 2, 3, and 5 years. This will enable the President to designate one member whose term will expire in 1948 and two other members whose terms will expire in 1949 and 1951, respectively. The latter, it is anticipated, will be subject to special scrutiny by the Republican-dominated Senate.

The Board, in organizing its staff, is required by the act to select personnel who are not only American citizens but who will enable it to function in an impartial manner. This presumably would exclude all personnel who are decidedly "left or right of center" and those who are known as "pinkish" or "fellow travelers." This provision should prove to be a boon to industry as well as to those labor organizations which have striven with notably poor success to rid themselves of Communist domination.

The Mediation Board is given exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine controversies with respect to representatives for collective bargaining, to grant, withhold, or revoke certification of unions, to require by order the resumption of collective bargaining. Whenever it breaks down and a strike is threatened, the Board is directed to use its best endeavors in such instances to mediate industrial differences and promote harmonious relations between employees and employers.

Another area of exclusive jurisdiction which the bill gives the Mediation Board is one of outstanding importance to the Nation and its economy. We have witnessed the consequences of work stoppages in industries where harmony existed in employer-employee relations and which were brought about because of strikes called in other industries whose functioning was necessary to the continuance of activities in the former. We have also witnessed the paralyzing results to the Nation's economy of strikes in those industries which were directly connected with the public health, safety, and welfare of the people.

The bill authorizes the Mediation Board to keep a watchful eye on all segments of the industrial economy and to evaluate the effect of strikes upon any level of the economy. Whenever the Board finds that any threatened strike will be inimical to the public interest by involving the safety, health, or welfare of the people, either directly or indirectly, such as by causing a slowdown or a work stoppage in a public utility or a food-processing industry, a declaration of that fact may be made by order of the Board. Thereupon a strike in such industry must be deferred for a period of 6 months. The refusal of any employee to continue in his work in such an industry in the interim is an unfair labor practice and would justify the termination of his employment and the hiring of another worker to replace him at his post of duty.

The closed shop and the closed union are banned, as is all violence and intimidation in organizing employees, forming unions and collecting dues. Secondary strikes, sympathy strikes, jurisdictional strikes are illegal and anyone guilty of indulging in any prohibited activity is subject to criminal penalties as well as to civil liabilities.

The bill certainly emancipates the American worker and protects him from violence, coercion, and compulsion. It preserves his right to free speech, to strike, and it also guarantees to him the unconditional right to work.

The bill elevates labor to the dignity and stature of responsibility and provides a sound foundation for its healthy development as a functioning element of our Nation's structure.

The bill and the index to the bill read as follows:

A bill to repeal the National Labor Relations Act, approved July 5, 1935, and to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Mediation Board to protect the public health, safety, and welfare, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.—

FINDINGS AND POLICY

SECTION 1. Experience has proved that protection by law of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively safeguards commerce from injury, impairment, or interruption, and promotes the flow of commerce by removing certain recognized sources of industrial strife and unrest, by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions, and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees.

Experience has proved that abuse of the rights conferred upon employees and labor organizations by the National Labor Relations Act has at times injuriously affected the public health, safety, and welfare; encouraged defiance of lawful authority and threatened civil strife.

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce, to eliminate the slowing down or cessation of activities which injuriously affect the public health, safety, and welfare, and to mitigate and eliminate those obstructions when they have occurred by furthering the development of friendly and mutually fair labor relations, by protecting the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by all workers and employers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or hiring or other mutual aid or protection.

DEFINITIONS

The President shall designate one member to serve as Chairman of the Board and may remove any member upon notice and hearing for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office but for no other cause.

(b) Each member of the Board shall receive a salary of $15,000 a year, shall be eligible for reappointment, and shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment.

(c) Upon the appointment and confirmation of the three original members of the Board and the designation of its Chairman, the old Board shall cease to exist.

(d) A vacancy on the Board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Board, and two members of the Board shall at all times constitute a quorum. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the Board, however, shall be filled as promptly as possible.

(e) The Board shall appoint, without regard for the provisions of the civil-service laws, but subject to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, an executive secretary and such attorneys, examiners, and regional directors, and shall appoint such other employees with regard to existing laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States, as it may, from time to time, find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress: Provided, however, That the Board shall not appoint any person to any position who is not at the time of such appointment an American citizen, nor shall the Board appoint an executive secretary, attorney, examiner, regional director or employee who shall have been an employer of 10 or more persons or who shall have been on the pay roll or an officer of a labor organization or industrial association within a period of 2 years prior to the effective date of such an appointment: Provided further, That the Board may also employ such employees of the old Board as may be specifically selected by the Board. Any employees of the old Board so selected and employed may be transferred to and become employees of the Board with salaries under the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, but no employee so transferred shall acquire a permanent or civil-service status by such transfer.

(f) All records, papers, and property of the old Board shall become records, papers, and property of the Board, and all unexpended funds and appropriations for the use and maintenance of the old Board shall become funds and appropriations available to be expended by the Board in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred on it by this act.

(g) All of the expenses of the Board, including all necessary traveling and subsistence expenses outside the District of Columbia incurred by the members or employees of the Board, under its orders, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the Board or by any individual it designates for that purpose.

(h) The principal office of the Board shall be in the District of Columbia, but it may meet and exercise any or all of its powers at any other place. The Board may, by one or more of its members, or by such agents or agencies as it may designate, hold hearings necessary to its functions in any part of the United States; except that in holding hearings necessary to its functions or otherwise in exercising the powers conferred upon it by this act the Board shall not, directly or indirectly, by its employees or otherwise, act in any other than a completely impartial manner. The Board may establish or utilize such regional, local, or other agencies and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated service as may from time to time be necessary and desirable to effectuate the purposes of this act: Provided, That persons or agencies so utilized shall be completely impartial.

(i) The Board shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

SEC. 4. The Board shall have exclusive jurisdiction—

(a) To hear and determine any and all controversies affecting the representation of employees for collective bargaining;

(b) To grant or withhold certification of representatives of employees for collective bargaining, and to revoke certification of such representatives for cause or whenever otherwise necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act;

(c) To hold such hearings as may be necessary in the performance of its duties and the exercise of its authority upon due notice to all parties in interest therein;

(d) To require by subpena the attendance at such hearings of any and all persons and to require the production of such books, papers, and records as may be necessary for the discharge of its duties. Any witness summoned before the Board or to any hearing or proceeding before the Board shall be paid the same fees and mileage as are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States. In case of failure to comply with any subpena or in case of the contumacy of any witness appearing before the Board, the

Board may invoke the aid of any United States district court. Such court may thereupon order the witnesses to comply with the requirements of such subpena or to give evidence touching the matter in question as the case may be. Any failure to obey such order may be punished by such court as in contempt thereof. No person shall be excused from attending or testifying nor from producing any book, paper, document, or other evidence on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing as to which, in obedience to a subpena and under oath, he may so testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, but no person shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying;

(e) To prescribe the forms of petitions and other pleadings and to administer all oaths and affirmations incidental to the conduct of any proceeding or hearing within the jurisdiction of the Board;

(f) Upon the receipt of notice that any party to a labor dispute intends to engage in a strike affecting commerce, to require by order the parties to such labor dispute to resume collective bargaining under the supervision of the Board upon any and all matters in controversy between them and, in conformity with the provisions of this act, to mediate such differences and any others which may arise.

(g) The Board shall have authority from time to time to make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That such rules and regulations shall not favor or discriminate against any party to any controversy to which this act is applicable, and shall be effective upon publication in the manner prescribed by law.

SEC. 5. The Board shall at the close of each fiscal year make a report in writing to Congress and to the President stating in detail the cases it has heard, the decisions it has rendered, the names, salaries, and duties of all employees and officers in the employ or under the supervision of the Board, and an account of all money it has disbursed.

RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES

SEC. 6. Employees shall have the unqualified right to freely form, join, and be members of any labor organization; to refrain from forming, joining, and from membership in any labor organization; to bargain individually or collectively with their employer; and to engage in and pursue individual or concerted activities for their mutual aid, protection, or for any other lawful purpose.

SEC. 7. (a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for any person—

(3) To refuse to resume collective bargaining or to participate in a mediation under the auspices of the Board, whenever ordered so to do by the Board;

(4) To deny to any employee or employer the benefits of any of the terms and conditions of any agreement touching wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of employment provided for in any agreement in existence at the time of the commencement of collective bargaining or during the pendency of any mediation required by the provisions of this act.

(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to violate any of the provisions of this act, or—

(1) By discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization;

(2) To discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this act, unless such testimony be proved to be willfully false;

(3) To refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of this act;

(4) To deduct from the wages of employees any dues, fees, assessments, or other contribution payable to labor organizations, or to collect or to assist in the collection of any such dues, fees, assessments, or other contribution, unless such deductions have been voluntarily authorized in writing by the employee from whose wages such deductions are made;

(5) To fail or to refuse to comply with a subpena to testify or to produce books, papers, and records, issued by the Board.

(2) To threaten, intimidate, restrain by force or threat, or coerce any other employee, directly or indirectly, for the purpose and with the intent of compelling such employee (a) to join or to refrain from joining any labor organization; (b) to continue or to suspend or to cease his employment; or (c) for the purpose or with the intent of influencing or affecting his selection of representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining;

(3) To resort to or engage in, during the course of any labor dispute and in connection with such dispute, any act or practice which is a violation of any criminal law effective in the jurisdiction in which such act or practice occurs;

(4) To interfere by threat, intimidation, or force or threat of force, with the exercise of the right by any employee to continue at his work or to go to or from his place of employment;

(5) To strike in violation of a valid contract or agreement or in violation of the provisions of this act;

(6) To refuse to continue in the performance of the duties of his employment at any place of employment in commerce whenever the Board shall find that such refusal will seriously endanger the public health, safety, or welfare by bringing about a work stoppage or slow-down in any industry, the continued operation of which is essential to the public health, safety, and welfare: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall in any way impede or diminish the right of an employee to terminate such employment at any time;

(7) To fail or to refuse to comply with a subpena to testify or to produce books, papers, and records, issued by the Board.

(d) It shall not be considered an unfair labor practice for an employer to discharge or to refuse to reemploy any person who, under the terms of this act, is guilty of an unfair labor practice; nor shall it be considered an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain with any organization which or employee who fails to recognize or be bound by the official certificate of collective bargaining representatives issued under section 9 hereof, or willfully violates the terms of a collective-bargaining contract.

(e) It shall not be considered an unfair labor practice for any person to fail to reach an agreement after bargaining for a reasonable period of time.

SEC. 8. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, (1) by force, intimidation, by threat thereof, or otherwise corruptly (a) to influence or attempt to prevent the free exercise by an employee of any of the rights prescribed in section 6 hereof; (b) to require or compel an employee to refrain or desist from continuing in his employment; (c) to molest or interfere with the right of an employee to peacefully go to or from the place of his employment; (2) to engage in any sit-down strike or other form of strike involving the illegal seizure or occupation of property; (3) to picket any place of employment in commerce in any manner other than peaceful; (4) to prevent, impede, or deny ingress to and egress from any place of employment in commerce; (5) to injure or destroy any place of employment in commerce, or any property therein; (6) to prevent the delivery to or the movement from any place of employment in commerce of any materials, goods, or commodities in commerce; (7) to halt, delay, or impede the free movement in commerce of any materials, goods, or commodities, or to refuse to load, unload, pack, ship, process, or handle any materials, goods, or commodities in commerce by reason of their manufacture, processing, packing, handling, or shipment, in whole or in part, by persons who either are or are not members of any labor organization; (8) to engage or participate in any sympathy or jurisdictional strike affecting commerce.

(b) Any person violating any of the provisions of subdivision (a) hereof shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000, or to imprisonment of not more than 1 year, or to both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 9. (a) Whenever a petition shall be filed with the Board by an employer, a group of employees numbering or a labor organization representing at least 20 percent of those employed by an employer, in a plant unit, praying for an order affecting representation of employees, affecting the certification of any labor organization as bargaining agent of employees, affecting the type of unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining, or otherwise within the provisions of this act, the Board shall provide for an appropriate hearing upon due notice to all parties having any interest therein, and shall, if appropriate to such proceeding, take within 10 days thereafter a secret ballot amongst all employees concerned therewith, affording adequate opportunity for all employees concerned to vote thereon, to determine the views of the majority, if any, with respect to the designation of representatives for collective bargaining, the type of unit most appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining, or otherwise to effectuate the purposes of this act.

(b) The form of the ballot shall be prescribed by the Board but the ballot shall in all cases clearly and fairly present the issue and the result of such election shall be certified by the election officials to the Board.

(c) All elections held under the provisions of this act shall be held under the direction of the local election board or boards of the election district or districts where the unit appropriate for such election shall be located and shall be conducted in the same manner as is provided by the laws of the State where such election is held insofar as the same are applicable.

(d) Before the Board shall issue any order certifying representatives for collective bargaining, the labor organization or representatives seeking certification shall qualify by filing with the Board a sworn statement setting forth the following information, which shall be brought up to date at least annually and whenever during any year any substantial change occurs in any of the facts set forth in the statement: (1) The official name or title of the labor organization or collective-bargaining agency; (2) the date established; (3) a copy of the constitution or articles of organization and of any by-laws in effect; (4) the names of all officers of the organization, with the certification that each is an American citizen; (5) the official address or principal place of business of the organization; (6) the names and addresses of the individuals who will actually function in collective bargaining with the employer, the majority of whom shall be bona fide employees of that employer, with the certification that each is an American citizen, the Board to be notified of any changes in the identity of the individuals who will function thus and those changes to be in accordance with the foregoing provisions; (7) a statement that its members are a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit in which such representatives were chosen.

(e) Any person aggrieved by any final order of the Board may obtain a review of such order by the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, in the circuit wherein such person resides or transacts business or in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, by filing in such court a written petition praying that the order of the Board be modified or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon all persons having any interest therein, and notice thereof shall be given to the Board. Thereafter, and within such time as may be required by rule or order of such court, the aggrieved party shall file in such court a transcript of the entire record of the proceedings before the Board, which record shall be certified by the Board, and shall include the petition, other pleadings, the testimony upon which the order complained of was entered, and the findings and the order of the Board. Upon such filing the court shall have jurisdiction to grant to any party to the proceeding such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper or otherwise necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act, and in like manner to make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying and enforcing as so modified or setting aside, in whole or in part, the order of the Board. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by the weight of the evidence, shall be conclusive.

(f) Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment: Provided, That any individual employee or a group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer.

PREVENTION OF UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

SEC. 10. (a) The district courts of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all other cases and controversies arising under the provisions of this act.

(b) Upon the filing in any district court of a complaint charging any person with the commission of any unfair labor practice, the court may make such temporary orders with or without bond as may effectuate the purposes of this act. The court, pursuant to such rules as may be prescribed hereunder, shall summarily require the joinder of issue on any such complaint, and, if possible within 10 days after the joinder of issue, shall hear the proofs and allegations of the parties and determine the matter or matters presented thereby. If after hearing the court shall be satisfied that any party to such action has engaged or is about to engage in any unfair labor practice the court shall make its findings of fact and shall render and cause to be served on such party a final order or judgment enjoining such party from such unfair labor practice, and requiring such affirmative action, including the payment of remedial severance pay, as will effectuate the purposes of this act and do justice in the cause. Such order or judgment may further require such party to report the extent to which he has complied with such order or judgment. If after hearing the court shall be of the opinion that no party to the action has engaged in or is about to engage in any unfair labor practice, then the court shall make findings of fact and render an order or judgment accordingly, dismissing the said complaint. As an incident to the rendition of judgment in any such action, the court shall award the prevailing party such reasonable attorney's fees as may be determined by the court, the costs allowable by law, and in addition may render judgment for such damages as may have been sustained by reason of the commission of any unfair labor practice.

(c) The commission of any unfair labor practice by or chargeable to the plaintiff in any such action, which the court shall find is related to the matter or matters in controversy therein, shall constitute a complete defense to such action.

(d) Except as hereinbefore provided, such actions shall be governed by the same rules, including rules of evidence, as may at any time be applicable in civil actions in the district courts. Any party to any such action shall have the same rights of appeal therein as are granted by statutes applicable in other civil actions in the district courts.

(e) For the purposes of this section, the term "district court" shall mean any district court of the United States, including the district courts of Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Canal Zone, Virgin Islands, and the District of Columbia, and the Supreme Courts of Hawaii and Puerto Rico.

(f) The President of the United States is authorized, upon request by the Chief Justice of the United States, to appoint from time to time, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, such additional district judges as may be necessitated by the enlarged jurisdiction conferred upon the district courts of the United States by the terms of this section.

MEDIATION OF LABOR DISPUTES

SEC. 11. Whenever any employer and his employees or their representatives, after having engaged in collective bargaining for a reasonable period of time, have been unable to agree on any matter affecting wages, rates of pay, terms, or conditions of employment, and in the opinion of any such person a controversy affecting commerce, or a labor dispute is likely to arise, or where because of such disagreement any party thereto has given notice to an employer that in the absence of the negotiation of an agreement any employee participating in such collective bargaining intends to engage in a strike which may affect commerce, notice of such fact shall forthwith be given to the Board in writing. Such notice shall contain a summary of the matters upon which such persons are in disagreement, as well as a summary of the matters upon which such persons are in agreement, and a copy of such notice shall be forthwith served upon any and all other parties who have participated in the collective bargaining. The Board shall thereupon, by order, require such parties to resume their bargaining upon any and all matters in controversy between them and shall use its best endeavors to mediate such differences as exist between the parties. If after a period of 30 days such controversy still exists, then it shall be lawful for the employees concerned therein to conduct a strike against such employer: Provided, however, That whenever the Board shall find that such threatened strike will seriously endanger the public health, safety, or welfare by bringing about a work stoppage or slow-down in any industry the continued operation of which is essential to the public health, safety, and welfare, it shall not be lawful for the employees concerned therein to conduct such strike until a period of 6 months has elapsed from the resumption of collective bargaining: Provided further, however, That nothing herein contained shall in any way impede or diminish the right of employees in such industries to individually or collectively terminate their employment therein at any time.

The wages, the rates of pay, the hours of employment, and other conditions of employment provided in the terms of any agreement between the parties to any labor dispute shall not be withheld, suspended, abated, lessened, or impaired during the period of collective bargaining or mediation provided for herein, or in any period during which it is unlawful for any employee to engage in a strike, notwithstanding the termination of any such agreement during the pendency of such negotiations or mediation.

LIMITATIONS

SEC. 12. If any provision of this act shall conflict with any provision of any other statute of the United States the provisions of this act shall be controlling: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to modify, amend or repeal any provision of any act governing or providing for the adjustment of disputes between carriers and their employees: Provided further, That in any situation where the provisions of this act cannot be validly enforced the provisions of such other acts shall remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 13. If any provision of this act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this act, or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

The National Labor Act approved July 5, 1935 (49 Stat. 449) is hereby repealed.

Perhaps you have not listened to what has just been said; more probable is it that what has been said has not been clearly and concisely stated. If that be true, the fault is mine; so permit me to impose upon you further by asking a few questions and attempting to answer them myself.

Here are some of the questions and at least a partial answer to each:

ANSWERS TO SOME OF YOUR QUESTIONS AND WHERE IN THE BILL YOU WILL FIND THEM—THE NUMBERS AND LETTERS REFER TO SECTIONS AND SUBSECTIONS OF THE BILL

Question No. 1. What is the purpose of the bill?

Answer. To diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening interstate and foreign commerce, to protect the right to work and to protect the public health, safety, and welfare—section 1.

Question No. 2. How is that purpose to be accomplished?

Answer. (a) By the enactment of legislation which insures equal privileges to, imposes equal burdens upon, employees and employers; protects the right of the unorganized worker; guarantees that labor disputes shall not be permitted to injuriously affect the public health, safety, and welfare.

(b) By the creation of a National Labor Mediation Board—section 3 (a)—with authority to hear complaints, designate collective-bargaining agents—section 4 (a)—and compel mediation—section 4 (f).

Question No. 3. Are the rights of employees defined?

Answer. Yes. Under the bill—section 6—employees have the right to form and join or to refrain from forming and joining a labor organization; to bargain individually or collectively.

Question No. 4. Does the bill provide for an open shop, prevent the imposition of a closed shop?

Answer. Yes; under section 6 employees are given the right to join or not to join a labor organization. That prevents the imposition of a closed shop upon unwilling workers. Subsequent provisions of the bill, such as those contained in sections 7 and 8, guarantee an open shop unless, by collective bargaining, all the employees themselves desire a closed shop.

Question No. 5. Are employees, union members and nonunion members, protected from unfair labor practices by employers, pickets, and others?

Answer. Yes; the bill—section 7 (a)—states that it is an unfair labor practice for any person to engage in certain acts; to, first, threaten or coerce any individual from exercising freely the rights guaranteed by section 6; or, second, to interfere in any manner with any union activity; or, third, to refuse to resume collective bargaining or participate in mediation; or, fourth, to deny to either an employee or an employer the benefits of any contract touching wages, hours of employment, or working conditions.

Question No. 6. Does the bill prohibit discrimination by an employer against an employee?

Answer. Yes; section 7 (b) declares that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to, first, discriminate in regard to employment; or, second, because he has filed complaint against the employer; third, to refuse to bargain collectively; or, fourth, to aid in any check-off unless the employee has given his consent in writing.

Question No. 7. Does the bill provide that certain acts performed by an employee shall be unfair labor practices?

Answer. Yes. The bill—section 7 (c)—declares it to be an unfair labor practice for an employee to—first, second, third, and fourth—in any manner, except by the use of free speech and peaceful picketing, interfere with the exercise of any of the rights guaranteed in section 6, or to in any manner interfere with the rights of an individual to join or not to join, to participate or not participate in union activities; or, fifth, to strike in violation of a contract or of the provisions of the act.

Question No. 8. Are any of the benefits of the act withheld from employees guilty of an unfair labor practice?

Answer. Yes; section 7 (d). An employer may discharge or refuse to reemploy an employee guilty of an unfair labor practice; may refuse to bargain with an organization or an employee who disregards the official representation certificate issued by the Board or willfully violates a contract.

Question No. 9. How long must collective bargaining continue?

Answer. Collective bargaining need not continue—section 7 (e)—until an agreement is reached. It need continue only for "a reasonable period of time," which by the Board shall be determined by taking into consideration the number of occasions upon which mediation meetings have been held, the length of time such meetings have continued, the views of the parties to the negotiation, and the prospect of an agreement. See definition of collective bargaining, section 2 (k).

Question No. 10. Does the bill impose criminal liability upon individuals who violate its provisions?

Answer. Yes; section 8. It declares that it shall be unlawful for any person, by force, intimidation, threat, or corruptly, to attempt to prevent the free exercise of any of the rights given by section 6; to compel an employee to quit his job or to interfere with him on his way to or from his job; to participate in a sit-down strike involving the illegal occupation of property; to picket otherwise than in a peaceful manner; to interfere with the movement of materials in commerce; to engage or participate in sympathy or jurisdictional strikes. The punishment inflicted—section 8 (b)—is imprisonment of not more than 1 year or a fine of $5,000, or both.

Question No. 11. Does the bill outlaw the closed shop, prevent violence, ban jurisdictional, sympathetic strikes and boycotts?

Answer. Yes. The application of this section—section 8—and of the remedies available under section 7 (d) and section 10 will tend to prevent intimidation, violence, jurisdictional, sympathetic strikes and boycotts; will ban the closed shop.

Question No. 12. How can an election to determine a bargaining representative be called?

Answer. Section 9 (a) provides that either the employer or 20 percent of the employees in a plant unit may by petition to the Board obtain an election to determine representatives for collective bargaining.

Question No. 13. Who holds the election and counts the ballots?

Answer. The local election board—section 9 (c)—the same Board which holds an election, counts the ballots, when a constable or a United States Senator is to be elected.

Question No. 14. Are there any restrictions which limit the right of a board to call an election?

Answer. Yes; section 9 (d). If a labor organization asks for such an election, it must file a sworn statement giving its official name, the date it was established, a copy of its constitution and bylaws, the names of its officers, accompanied by a statement that each is an American citizen, the official address of its organization, and the names and the addresses of the individuals who will act in collective bargaining with the employer. Such bargaining agents must be certified to be American citizens. There must also be a statement that the members of the union are a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit in which the representatives were chosen.

Question No. 15. Is there any relief from a final order made by the Board?

Answer. Yes; section 9 (e). By appeal to the United States circuit court of appeals.

Question No. 16. How can relief from or punishment of unfair labor practices be obtained?

Answer. By—section 10 (a, b)—filing with the United States district court a petition setting forth the facts upon which the complaint is based, asking for appropriate relief. After hearing, that court may make such orders as may be necessary to effectuate the purposes of the act and to do justice.

Question No. 17. Are there any special rules of procedure to be followed in such application?

Answer. No; except as provided in section 10. The rules of procedure applicable in civil action in the district courts, including the rules of evidence applied by those courts, shall obtain.

Question No. 18. Does the bill provide for a cooling-off period and for mediation?

Answer. Yes; section 11. After the parties have bargained for a reasonable length of time and have been unable to agree and a strike is threatened, a 30-day notice must be given before a strike can legally be called. If the threatened strike will seriously endanger the public health, safety, and welfare, there must be a waiting period of 6 months, though, in the meantime, the employees may, individually or collectively, terminate their employment at any time, but, if they do, they are out of a job.

Question No. 19. Does the bill ban strikes which injuriously affect the public health, safety, and welfare?

Answer. Yes. Section 11 provides that if the Board finds that any strike or threatened strike will seriously endanger the public health, safety, and welfare by either a sit-down or a work stoppage in any industry, the continued operation of which is essential to the public health, safety, and welfare, the employees shall not strike until the expiration of a 6-month period after notice thereof has been given. If they do strike, then their rights as employees cease and the employer may hire other workers without being guilty of an unfair labor practice. In effect, such procedure would deprive the striking employees of their benefits under the act and lessen strikes in public utilities.

Question No. 20. Does the bill seek to prevent picketing?

Answer. No; not lawful picketing.

Question No. 21. Does the act repeal or carry exemptions of any other act?

Answer. Yes; section 13. It repeals the National Labor Relations Act, but continues in force the act governing disputes between carriers and their employees.

Mr. Speaker, in closing these somewhat extended remarks which have trespassed upon your time and patience, let me offer the excuse that the subject is one which is deemed to be of the utmost importance. For more than 10 years, from the floor of this House and elsewhere, in my humble way, attention was called to the situation which from time to time has confronted us; which has steadily, and with ever-increasing speed, developed into what has now given every appearance of being an insistent demand which will not be denied; that the Congress act speedily and with the sole purpose of enacting labor legislation which will protect not only the right of collective bargaining, the right of organized workers, but as well, the rights of the unorganized worker and the paramount right of the public.

Mr. ANGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by Mr. James H. Polhemus.

SENATE

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Save this moment, O Lord, from being merely a gesture to custom or convention, and make it a real experience for each one of us in this place, as we call upon Thee for guidance and for help.

We have felt Thee near and beside us in the exalted experience of worship in church; make us now to feel Thy nearness in the business of the day—the Unseen Delegate, present and voting. Vote through these men, we pray Thee, O Jesus, that what they say and what they do may be in accordance with Thy will for this land that we love so much.

Thou hast said: "When ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against any." Give us the grace to lay aside all bitterness or resentment we may be nursing in our hearts, lest their acid eat into our peace and corrode our spirits.

Thou hast said: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Give us the grace today to think not of what we can get but of what we can give, that a new spirit may come into our work here, with a new vision and a new purpose, that Thou wilt delight to bless.

We ask these things in Thine own name and for Thy sake. Amen.

COMMITTEE JURISDICTION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before proceeding with the morning hour the Chair wishes to rule finally upon the question of order which was raised by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] at the last session of the Senate. The Senator raised an important point of order regarding the reference of certain bills to committees, as reported at page 218 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There was general discussion of the matter in the Senate, but without conclusive action. The Chair wishes to rule this morning on the point of order raised by the Senator from Illinois.

He pointed out that a bill dealing with the portal-to-portal problem, introduced by the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], had been referred to the Judiciary Committee, while, on the same day, another bill, on the same subject, introduced by the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The Senator from Illinois appropriately raised the question whether two bills on the same general subject should not go to the same committee.

The bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana, S. 49, showed by its title that it proposed to "amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938," and it was automatically referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, which is the successor to the former Senate committee from which that act came.

The bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin, S. 70, did not propose an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 and its title invited no such implication. The bill raised the purely legal question as to the legal nature of the portal-to-portal problem and proposed a remedy confined exclusively to legal procedure. Unquestionably constitutional questions are involved. It did not occur then to the Chair—nor does it now—that such a bill should go anywhere else than to the Judiciary Committee, which would clearly appear to have jurisdiction, not only in the general nature of the case, but also in the definitions contained in the Reorganization Act. Furthermore, it is to be recalled that the so-called Gwynne bill, dealing with the statute of limitations on the same subject, was referred to the Judiciary Committee in the last session.

Upon further examination, it is entirely clear that the subject matter of both bills involves the same ultimate objective and both bills have a common theme which could put them in the purview of either committee. But it is equally clear that only one committee should have jurisdiction of the problem. It was for this reason that the Chair announced his purpose to confer with the chairmen of both committees to determine, as a practical proposition, which committee should take jurisdiction.

This has been done. The situation is as follows: The chairman of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], believes that the bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin (S. 70) was properly referred to the Judiciary Committee; he further believes that the whole portal-to-portal problem may be properly handled, under the rules, by the Judiciary Committee; and he is favorable to this reference. Meanwhile, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], has appointed a subcommittee, headed by the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], which will start public hearings on S. 70 next Wednesday morning; and the bill (S. 49) introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] has been reintroduced as an amendment to the Wiley bill (S. 70), and has been referred to the Judiciary Committee, and the Chair understands that the Senator from Indiana will be the first witness before the Judiciary Committee next Wednesday.

The subject matter involved in these bills is of imminent importance to the country. The object of procedural rules is not to hamper but to facilitate the business of the Senate. Under the existing circumstances, since there is a mixed jurisdiction which permits reference to either of these two Senate committees, the Chair will refer any other current legislation on this subject to the Judiciary Committee unless directed otherwise by the Senate.

The Chair thanks the Senator from Illinois for having raised his point of order. The Chair agrees with him and with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] that the spirit of the Reorganization Act puts new emphasis upon the importance of the appropriate reference of bills and resolutions to proper committees, and that this is the duty of the Presiding Officer without regard to any special requests for reference which may be made by the authors of such bills and resolutions.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS ON BILL TO TERMINATE PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES

Mr. DONNELL. I ask unanimous consent to make an announcement with respect to the proceedings before the subcommittee referred to in the statement just made by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from Missouri is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, there have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary a bill, namely, S. 70, introduced by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] on January 6, 1947, entitled "A bill to exempt employers from liability for portal-to-portal wages in certain cases, and for other purposes," and an amendment offered by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] on January 10, 1947, as a substitute for S. 70, the offer of which amendment appears at page 223 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

On January 10, 1947, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary appointed a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], and myself, the scope of the duties of which subcommittee has been subsequently defined to be to consider and make recommendations with respect to said S. 70 and said amendment so offered as a substitute. The senior Senator from Wisconsin, who is the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, is ex-officio a member of the subcommittee. I was designated as chairman of the subcommittee.

I hereby give notice to the Senate that the subcommittee will begin hearings at the office of the Committee on the Judiciary, 424 Senate Office Building, on the morning of Wednesday, January 15, 1947, at 9:30 o'clock. The first witness scheduled to be heard by the subcommittee is the senior Senator from Indiana.

The hearings will be conducted as expeditiously as possible and consistent with thorough presentation. All persons desiring to appear should promptly communicate with the office of the Committee on the Judiciary. The subcommittee will, so far as practicable, require all witnesses appearing before it to file in advance written statements of their proposed testimony at least 24 hours before hearing, and to limit their oral presentations to brief summaries of their argument.

This special notice to the Senate is given in view of the great importance of the questions involved in the subjects committed to the subcommittee for its consideration and recommendations.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. In line with our conversation had this morning in the Committee on the Judiciary, I understand that the Senator from Missouri, as chairman of the subcommittee, is making the statement to the Senate for the purpose of informing the Senate of the general scope of the hearings involved, because of the conflict over the subject matter of the bill. It is, is it not, the Senator's intention to emphasize in the hearings the legal aspects of this problem?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I do not think it advisable to limit the language used in the announcement which I have made. As stated:

> The scope of the duties of the subcommittee has been * * * defined to be to consider and make recommendations with respect to said S. 70 and said amendment so offered as a substitute.

I think that language speaks for itself, and I prefer not to interpose an interpretation, this being the action this morning taken by the Committee on the Judiciary.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR LYNN J. FRAZIER, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I rise to announce to the Senate the death of former Senator Lynn J. Frazier, of North Dakota.

Senator Frazier had a long and distinguished record of public service in North Dakota and in the Nation. He was three times elected governor of his State. For 18 years he represented the State of North Dakota in this body. He was a faithful, honest servant and truly represented the interests of the farmers, the laborers, and the small businessmen of the Nation.

Originally elected by the Non-Partisan League Republicans of our State, he refused their endorsement in June 1940. Had he accepted I am sure he would have been overwhelmingly reelected. He had the merited confidence of our people to a remarkable degree, and I am sure that many Senators here today who served with him join with citizens of North Dakota and all other sections of the Nation in sincere regret over his passing.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the senior Senator from North Dakota in respect to the passing of one of North Dakota's most distinguished citizens.

Lynn J. Frazier was one of our early pioneers who during his entire life took a leading part in the development and government of the State. For more than two decades he served with marked honor and credit in the highest offices the State could offer. His integrity and honesty of purpose were never questioned even by his bitterest political foes.

All North Dakota mourns the passing of Lynn J. Frazier, a worthy and faithful public servant.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I desire to express my sorrow at the sad news which has just been given to the Senate by the Senators from North Dakota relating to the death of our former colleague, Senator Frazier.

USE OF GRAIN IN MANUFACTURE OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR—PETITION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received from Mrs. A. F. Goad, corresponding secretary of the Women's Organization, of Augusta, Kans., a petition to Congress to pass legislation that will prevent the use of grain in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor and for other nonessential purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the petition be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

To prevent the use of grain for nonessential purposes during the period of shortages, and enable America to make her maximum contribution to the food needs of her own country and the world, we the undersigned citizens of the State of Kansas petition the Congress of the United States to pass House Joint Resolution 325, and thereby take all grain away from the nonessential brewing and distilling industry.

THE FARMER'S ANGLE—STATEMENT BY HOMER AYRES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received an able and convincing statement in support of a constructive program entitled "The Farmer's Angle," written by Homer Ayres, who is the farm relations director of the United Farm Equipment and Metal Workers of America, 188 West Randolph Street, Chicago, Ill. I ask unanimous consent to have the statement printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Wheat is not only the timber from which the staff of life is constructed; it is also a political ferment that starts operating either when people have too few of the golden berries or when, in the case of farmers, they are told they raise too many, and go bankrupt.

The price of wheat, as it relates to farm-operating cost in the Northwest, has been the yeast that touched off past farm revolts, and today this ferment is again liberated and at work.

Grain farmers, of course, know that in many places in the world people are starving for want of the wheat with which they are beginning to be plagued. Farmers are being told again that surpluses are piling up and the price will no doubt drop sadly. But inflation has skyrocketed farm living and operating costs. So there is an uneasy feeling again, and farmers take another look at their hole card and wonder if they can't do something about it.

This situation is what brought Fiorello H. LaGuardia to the Twin Cities recently in response to an invitation of the Farmers' Union Grain Terminal Association on the occasion of its annual meeting. The GTA is a gigantic farmer-owned cooperative grain-marketing institution that handles around 40 percent of the total grain raised in the area. This year, as a monument to their steadfastness, they were able to dedicate a new million-dollar office building. The farmer members of this cooperative are proud of their achievements because they represent victories over their enemies, the grain speculators, who have waxed fat through the years on the farmers' sweat and toil. And the impact of these farmers on national politics, when they get in motion, should not be underestimated.

LaGuardia told the farmers: "We want no swivel-chair farmers or professional politicians or spokesmen for the ticker-tape boys to arbitrarily decide the destiny of the American farmers." And the farmers ate it up. He told the farmers that they needed the world food and agricultural organization as a reservoir of food that would not only stabilize farm prices but would also solve the hunger problem and promote world peace. The farmers heeded LaGuardia and will soon put a heat campaign on Congress to prevent the "ticker tapers" from scuttling FAO and reducing it to a mere fact-finding and statistical bureau.

The Little Flower also linked up the grain speculators with the "cookie pushers with striped pants" who operated the State Department.

There was much consternation in high places over the LaGuardia speech at this great farm gathering, and immediately one of the cold-water artists of the grain trade was rushed to the scene to proclaim that LaGuardia preached false doctrines to "make over our democratic system."

But these Farmers' Union farmers know that their interests are with people who need bread to eat and not with overfed millionaires. People who have been dejected because farmers at times become victims of reactionary big-business propaganda would have received a new lease on life if they had attended the LaGuardia-GTA meeting. Great things will come of it.

COMMISSION ON ORGANIZATION OF THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I introduce a bill, which is similar to one introduced last week in the House by Representative CLARENCE J. BROWN, of Ohio, to establish a Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of Government. I ask for its reference to the appropriate committee.

The bill (S. 164) for the establishment of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, introduced by Mr. LODGE, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have prepared a statement which I should like to have inserted in full in the RECORD, but I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 1 minute to read the few last paragraphs of the statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. LODGE. I read from the statement:

This Commission will find the places where economies can be effected and the places where there is overlapping and duplication. It will list and define the functions of government.

Another important problem which must be solved is that of developing a steady flow of high-quality civil servants at the policy-making level. Without such personnel effective government is not possible.

There is a reason why popular representative government has endured in this country whereas it has disappeared in so many other nations of the earth. The reason is that in these other nations government for one cause or another ceased to be an effective instrument for translating into action the aims and the aspirations of the people. Our system of government will endure just as long as people can look to it with confidence that it is both responsive and effective. The prompt enactment of this bill is an essential first step toward the maintenance of truly popular government.

There being no objection, the statement submitted by Mr. LODGE was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LODGE

In his introductory statement Congressman BROWN said that the purpose of the Commission would be to "make a thorough study and investigation of the services, activities, and functions of all departments, bureaus, agencies, boards, commissions, offices, independent establishments, and instrumentalities of the executive branch for the purpose of promoting economy, efficiency, and improved service in the transaction of the public business.

"The need for such a study and investigation should be apparent to all. The executive branch of the Federal Government has undergone fantastic growth in the last few decades. Thirty years ago the number of executive establishments of the rank of a bureau or equivalent is reported to have been 158. In 1932 the number had increased to 521. By 1944 the number had grown to 1,141. During this same period of time the number of civilian employees of the executive branch of the Government had increased at an amazing rate. In 1916 Federal workers numbered 438,057. In 1926, 528,542. In 1936, 824,259, and in 1946, 2,766,165.

"The legislative branch of our Government has already been streamlined and reorganized. The time has now come to take the first step toward reorganizing and streamlining the executive branch. While the President has had the authority under laws enacted in recent years to reorganize the executive department and its various subdivisions, nothing of real significance or benefit has been accomplished under that authority. Neither the President nor the Congress is now in position to make a comprehensive study and investigation, or to take the preliminary steps necessary to put the executive branch of the Government on an economical and efficient basis.

"I wish to point out that the duties conferred upon the Commission under my bill are solely to study and investigate present organization and methods of operation, and from the results of such study and investigation to submit findings and recommendations to the Congress as to what changes are necessary, in their opinion, to effectuate the policies set forth in the bill. The Congress has complete authority to accept or reject, in its discretion, any or all of the recommendations of the Commission.

"I also wish to emphasize the fact that the Commission will be completely bipartisan and truly representative. Included in its membership will be representatives of the Congress and of the President, as well as of the general public."

The Commission should consist of men of high-grade ability, great experience, and true vision. They will be required to make their report in January of 1949, so that their findings will be available to the Eighty-first Congress. The time to make such a study is now, just as the partisan composition of our Federal Government is in a state of flux.

This job requires a special commission because congressional committees have not the time to give to such work.

There has been no attempt to reorganize the Government since the end of hostilities. War leaves a lot of rubble and waste in the field of government, just as it does on the battlefield.

While this Commission in no way retards or affects the duty of the present Congress to make all possible economies now, it is, nevertheless, evident that further economies will be possible once all these facts are known. The tangle is now so thick that it is often hard to prune out the deadwood without chopping down the tree.

This Commission will find the places where economies can be effected and the places where there is overlapping and duplication. It will list and define the functions of government.

Another important problem which must be solved is that of developing a steady flow of high-quality civil servants at the policy-making level. Without such personnel effective government is not possible.

There is a reason why popular representative government has endured in this country, whereas it has disappeared in so many other nations of the earth. The reason is that in these other nations government, for one cause or another, ceased to be an effective instrument for translating into action the aims and the aspirations of the people. Our system of government will endure just as long as people can look to it with confidence that it is both responsive and effective. The prompt enactment of this bill is an essential first step toward the maintenance of truly popular government.

RENEWAL OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the existing law to provide the privilege of renewing expiring 5-year level-premium term United States Government life insurance policies for another 5-year period.

Five-year level-premium term policies were first authorized in 1926. Statutes providing for three renewals have since been enacted making a total of 20 years during which United States Government life insurance could be carried. The last of such renewal statutes was enacted in 1942. Such policies permit World War I veterans to keep up insurance policies, which, although of the lowest grade, having no cash-surrender or loan values, nevertheless provide a means for such veterans to maintain life insurance. As of the end of November 1946 there were 37,500 of such policies in force. The passage of this measure will enable such veterans who are physically and financially unable to obtain life insurance policies of higher grades to keep in force their low-level term policies on which they have paid premiums for 20 years.

The bill (S. 169) to amend existing law to provide privilege of renewing expiring 5-year level-premium term United States Government life insurance policies for another 5-year period, introduced by Mr. BROOKS, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT OF REORGANIZATION ACT RELATING TO JOINT COMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICES AND EFFICIENCY

Mr. McCLELLAN submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 3), which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 is amended by adding at the end of title II thereof the following new section:

"JOINT COMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICES AND EFFICIENCY

"SEC. 246. (a) There is hereby created a joint congressional committee, to be known as the Joint Committee on Administrative Practices and Efficiency (hereinafter referred to as the 'committee').

"(b) The committee shall be composed of the Members of the Senate who are members of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and the Members of the House of Representatives who are members of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

"(c) No person shall continue to serve as a member of the committee after he has ceased to be a member of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments or the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, as the case may be.

"(d) Vacancies in the committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the committee.

"(e) The members of the committee shall serve without additional compensation for their services, but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the committee, other than expenses in connection with the meetings of the committee held in the District of Columbia during such time as the Congress is in session.

"(f) The committee shall elect a chairman and vice chairman from among its members.

"(g) The committee shall, without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, employ and fix the compensation of such professional, clerical, and other employees as may be necessary to carry out the duties of the committee, and all of such employees shall be appointed without regard to political affiliation and solely on the ground of fitness to perform the duties to which they may be assigned: Provided, That the chairman of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and the chairman of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments may, in their discretion, with the consent of a majority of their said committee, assign regular personnel from the professional staff and the clerical staff of their respective committee to duties related to the work of the Joint Committee on Administrative Practices and Efficiency herein created. Said personnel so assigned shall receive no additional compensation to that paid them as members of the personnel staff of the regular Senate and House Committees on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Employees of the committee, upon the written authority of the chairman or vice chairman, shall have the right to examine the books, documents, papers, reports, or other records of any department or agency of the Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere.

"(h) No decision shall be made by the committee except upon a majority vote of the Members representing each House, taken separately.

"(i) The committee is authorized and empowered to conduct investigations and studies into the practices, procedures, administrative processes, and efficiency of any department or agency of the Government or any corporation owned by the Government or in which the Government has a financial interest. The committee shall receive and consider complaints relating to the practices, procedures, administrative processes, and efficiency of any such department, agency, or corporation. The committee is empowered upon resolutions adopted by either the Senate or the House of Representatives or upon complaint or upon its own initiative to make such investigations and studies under this subsection as in its judgment may be necessary to keep the Congress fully informed as to whether or not the laws of the United States are being properly and efficiently administered and as to whether or not additional legislation is necessary and appropriate to improve their administration. It shall be the duty of the committee to make such studies and investigations when directed by resolution of either House of Congress, or upon its own initiative.

"(j) The committee shall report to the Congress annually on or before the 1st of February and at such other times as it deems advisable the results of its investigations and studies and may make such recommendations as it deems advisable.

"(k) The committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall have power to hold hearings and to sit and act anywhere within or without the District of Columbia whether the Congress is in session or has adjourned or is in recess; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents; to administer oaths; to take testimony; to have printing and binding done; and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable within the amount appropriated therefor. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman or vice chairman of the committee and shall be served by any person designated by them. The provisions of sections 102 to 104, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 2, secs. 192–194) shall apply in the case of any failure of any witness to comply with any subpena or to testify when summoned under authority of this section.

"(l) Appropriations for the expenses of the committee shall be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate upon vouchers signed by the chairman or the vice chairman."

Mr. ROBERTSON of Wyoming submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 53), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 160, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, agreed to July 10, 1935, authorizing a special committee to investigate the production, transportation, and marketing of wool, as extended, is hereby further extended and continued in full force and effect during the Eightieth Congress; and the said committee may report to the Senate at any time prior to December 31, 1947. The said committee hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate, $10,000, in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized for the same purposes.

TEMPORARY ASSISTANTS TO COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BROOKS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 54), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That in carrying out the duties imposed upon it by subsection (o) (1) (D) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Committee on Rules and Administration, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to make such expenditures, and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $35,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BROOKS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 55), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking from subdivision (o) (2) thereof the following language:

"Such committee shall also have the duty of examining all bills, amendments, and joint resolutions after passage by the Senate; and, in cooperation with the Committee on House Administration of the House of Representatives, of examining all bills and joint resolutions which shall have passed both Houses, to see that the same are correctly enrolled; and when signed by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, shall forthwith present the same, when they shall have originated in the Senate, to the President of the United States in person, and report the fact and date of such presentation to the Senate."

Resolved further, That rule XIV of the Standing Rules be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after paragraph numbered 4 the following paragraph, to be numbered 5:

"5. The Secretary of the Senate shall examine all bills, amendments, and joint resolutions before they go out of the possession of the Senate, and shall examine all bills and joint resolutions which shall have passed both Houses, to see that the same are correctly enrolled, and, when signed by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, shall forthwith present the same, when they shall have originated in the Senate, to the President of the United States and report the fact and date of such presentation to the Senate."

Renumber paragraph numbered 5 of said rule as paragraph numbered 6.

SAFETY RECORD IN CIVIL AVIATION

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, undoubtedly all Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives will be interested in knowing what fatalities have come about by the augmentation of air transportation in America. I have in my hand a very short letter, of less than two pages, which came to me from the Assistant Secretary of Commerce bearing on that particular subject. I think the letter is so interesting that I ask unanimous consent to have it read at the desk, and that it together with its appendages, may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, January 10, 1947.

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Knowing of your interest in everything connected with civil aviation, I am forwarding a copy of safety record of scheduled domestic and scheduled United States flag international air lines from 1939 through 1946.

I think you will be interested in the fact that for domestic and international services combined passenger fatalities per hundred million passenger miles flown, which is the best index of comparative safety, were the lowest in 1946 for any year on record.

The figure for 1946 was only 1.6 passenger fatalities per hundred million passenger-miles flown as compared to 2.31 in 1945.

For domestic operations alone, there were only 1.24 passenger fatalities per hundred million passenger-miles in 1946 as compared with 2.14 in 1945, an improvement of approximately 40 percent. This is over twice as safe as the 1945 record (1946 figures not yet available) for passenger automobiles of 2.9 deaths per hundred million passenger-miles.

I think you will also be interested in exhibit 2 which shows the trend of safety over 3-year periods from 1932 through 1946. A 3-year average is used so as to give a more representative statistical sample and eliminate the element of luck affecting the figures for any one period. You will note that the average for 1944 through 1946 was 1.67 passenger fatalities per hundred million passenger-miles—a 30-percent improvement over the previous 3 years. This is the greatest relative improvement accomplished in any 3-year period, except in 1938 through 1940, where the introduction of DC–3 resulted in a great jump over the previous record.

Comparison of the safety record of United States flag international operations with the international operators of other countries in 1946 indicates that the United States operations were several times safer.

These figures, of course, provide no reason for complacency as much remains to be done before air transport achieves the ultimate in safety, but the fact that 1946 was the best year on record so far, and that the improvement has been substantial and steady over 3-year periods, is certainly an important and encouraging fact with which I thought you should be acquainted.

I would be glad to explain these figures in detail to you in case you should be interested.

Sincerely,
WILLIAM A. M. BURDEN,
Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the appendages to the letter need not be read, but I ask that they be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator will be complied with.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I should like to ask one question of the Senator from Nevada, realizing his complete understanding of the subject of aviation, his interest in it, and the letter which has just been read. Is it not a fact that, as to the factors of safety in air travel, one of the best indexes is the attitude of the insurance companies toward risks flying in planes; and is it not further a fact that insurance companies have been even more lenient in considering these risks now, in the face of recent accidents, than heretofore?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; I am so advised.

Mr. TOBEY. The Senator would call that fairly expert testimony, would he not?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

USE OF MONOPOLISTIC POWER AS WEAPON IN LABOR DISPUTES—REPORT BY SENATOR KINGSLEY TAFT, OF OHIO

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, my colleague from the time of the last election to the opening of the present session of Congress, Senator Kingsley Taft, while he was here, prepared a report on the question of protecting the public from the use of monopolistic power as a weapon in labor disputes, together with a proposed bill. I ask that the statement and the bill may be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT OF SENATOR KINGSLEY TAFT, OF OHIO, ON PROTECTING THE PUBLIC FROM USE OF MONOPOLISTIC POWER AS WEAPON IN LABOR DISPUTES

In preparing for the eventuality of a session during the 2 months that I have had the privilege of representing the State of Ohio in the United States Senate, it became apparent to me that the people of this Nation needed prompt and effective protection from the use of monopolistic power against them by labor organizations as a weapon in labor disputes. Other legislative proposals did not seem to recognize or deal with this particular problem.

For this reason I am submitting this report in the hope that it may be of some help in the preparation of effective legislation by the Eightieth Congress.

1. NECESSITY FOR LEGISLATION

The labor required to produce an essential commodity is just as necessary an element in the production of that commodity as the raw material required to produce it. Without that labor, the commodity cannot be produced, even though the raw material is available. It necessarily follows that monopolistic control of the labor required to produce the commodity may be as great a threat to the public as monopolistic control of the raw material required to produce it. Any legislative statement to the contrary simply ignores the facts.

If any property owner or combination of property owners should secure such a control of the supply of a commodity, normally a subject of interstate commerce, that they could keep it from going to market, that is, make it impossible for people to buy it—then we would say they had a monopoly.

Since enactment of the Sherman Act in 1890, such a monopoly has been unlawful and there are ample provisions in our laws which would enable the Government to prevent the group having the monopoly from either causing or threatening to cause disaster to the public by using their monopolistic power. The antitrust laws have been construed as not only providing against exercise of such monopolistic power, but also providing against its existence, even though it is not exercised. Even such monopolies in nonessentials are outlawed.

However, the antitrust laws during the past 30 years have been so amended that it is possible, without violating them, for a labor organization or a group of labor organizations not only to acquire the monopolistic power, which would enable them to cut off completely the supply of even an essential commodity or service, but also to exercise that power.

Unthinkable as it is, the Government will be powerless in peacetime to protect the people of the United States against the exercise by a labor organization, or combination of labor organizations, of power to cut off all or substantially all of the supply of labor required to provide an essential commodity or service, even though exercise of that power would threaten disaster to the American people.

This appears clear on consideration of the Norris-LaGuardia Act (29 U. S. C. 101, etc.) and certain sections of the Clayton Act (29 U. S. C. 52, and 15 U. S. C. 17) as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Hutcheson (312 U. S. 219). As pointed out by that Court in Allen Bradley Company v. Local Union No. 3, decided last June (89 L. Ed. 1441): "* * * the desirability of such an exemption of labor unions is a question for the determination of Congress."

Whether the Government can even supply necessary protection to the public in wartime, through the device of Government seizure and operation of the industry involved, is now before the Supreme Court of the United States.

No individual or group should be allowed to have an absolute right to cause or threaten disaster to the people of this country. The exercise by labor organizations of power to cut off all or substantially all labor required to supply an essential commodity or service, can certainly cause or threaten such disaster. Such an exercise of power must always be prevented. Because of the resulting injury to the public, monopoly power, as a weapon in a labor dispute, should never be tolerated.

The recent coal crisis was a warning of the disaster which could result from a failure to prevent the exercise by labor organizations of monopolistic power to cut off all or substantially all labor necessary to supply an essential commodity. The increasing frequency of these warnings during the recent past emphasizes the prompt need for permanent legislation which will protect the public against the exercise of such monopolistic power.

2. OUTLINE OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION AND ITS EFFECTS

The Government has encouraged the organization of labor in groups which have monopolistic power. To require the breaking up of those groups, as is done with business groups that have monopolistic power, would therefore be quite revolutionary. Furthermore, legislation preventing them from exercising their monopolistic power in all instances, rather than merely where such exercise would inflict severe injury on the public, would represent a serious interference with existing labor organizations and their activities. For these reasons, application of the restraint of trade section (sec. 1), or even of the monopoly section (sec. 2), of the Sherman Act, does not appear practicable. A practicable solution, and one which should arouse a minimum of opposition, would require an effective means of preventing the exercise of such monopolistic power where such exercise would cause or threaten disaster to the public. This would provide protection which the public must have with a minimum of inconvenience to labor organizations and their activities. The draft of a bill, attached hereto, is designed to provide this solution.

Section 1 (a) makes it unlawful to "so monopolize the labor of human beings, or otherwise induce them to refrain from working, as to prevent the supply of a commodity or service to such an extent that severe hardship is or will be inflicted on the public." This represents a limited adoption of the pattern of section 2 of the Sherman Act. The same penalties, by way of fine or imprisonment, are provided for as in that section.

Section 1 (b) defines "the public" to include what might be referred to as "outsiders"—that is, those who are not owners or employees of businesses involved in the labor dispute or merely interested as sellers of its products.

Sections 1 (c) and (d) contain appropriate definitions of the word "commerce" and of the words "person" and "persons."

Section 2 (a) contains provisions enabling the Government to secure court orders preventing or restraining violations of section 1. It is substantially identical to section 4 of the Sherman Act.

Section 2 (b) authorizes the court, where clearly necessary to protect the public from severe hardship, to direct employees to return to their posts of duty within a reasonable time. Provision is made for taking away rights of employees as such under the National Labor Relations Act or the Railway Labor Act where they willfully fail to comply with the court's direction. This method of enforcement is somewhat similarly provided for in sections 3 (d) and 10 (d) of the Case bill (H. R. 4908), section 12 (d), of the Ball-Burton-Hatch bill (S. 1171), and section 6 of the bill proposed by President Truman last May, as amended by the Senate (H. R. 6578).

Section 2 (c) is a provision for bringing in additional parties where necessary and is substantially the same as section 5 of the Sherman Act.

Section 2 (d) provides for the court retaining jurisdiction so that any final order may be revised from time to time where such revision appears to be proper. Similar provisions are usually included in final orders made by equity courts in Sherman Act cases.

Section 2 (e) is designed to make it clear that the Clayton and Norris-LaGuardia Acts are not to limit the power of the court under this act.

There would be little danger of unfair use of this legislation to break strikes, not involving, as a weapon, the use of monopoly power to threaten public disaster. In the first place, proceedings for enforcement could be instituted only by the Federal Government. Furthermore, the requirement of court action would provide an additional obstacle against its unfair use.

This legislation would not outlaw all industry-wide strikes because many of them would not inflict severe hardship on the public. For example, an industry-wide strike in the watch industry, unlike that in the coal industry, would not inflict severe hardship on the public. It also would not outlaw those strikes in essential industries which did not paralyze such a large portion of the industry as to inflict severe hardship on the public. For example, a strike involving even as much as 30 percent of the coal industry would probably leave available a sufficient supply of coal so as to avoid inflicting a severe hardship on the public. However, it would prevent a strike which would shut down a public utility that was the sole source of an essential service to a community. Such a shut-down might well be as disastrous in its effects as a strike of all of the firemen in a community.

It is difficult to comprehend why the latter effect of the bill should provide any valid argument against its enactment. In other words, the labor organizations using the strike weapon against such a public utility would have to use it, if at all, carefully, so as to cause mere inconvenience rather than extreme hardship on the public. This might be accomplished by a partial, rather than a general strike, against the employer.

3. OTHER LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS WILL NOT PROVIDE THE PUBLIC WITH APPROPRIATE PROTECTION

There are numerous proposals for labor legislation now under consideration. Those which might be considered as giving the public some protection against the exercise of monopolistic power by labor organizations may be classified under rather definite headings and will be hereafter discussed under those headings.

(a) Waiting periods

These are usually provided for in connection with mediation boards and fact-finding commissions. Such provisions are contained in the Ball-Burton-Hatch bill and the Case bill.

However, after the waiting period has expired, the public has no protection. These provisions may tend to discourage strikes, but give no protection against monopolistic strikes which come into existence despite the fact that they have been discouraged.

(b) Compulsory arbitration or labor courts

For the purpose of disposing of those controversies which threatened disaster to the public, provision was made in the Ball-Burton-Hatch bill for compulsory arbitration, and suggestions have also been made that labor courts be established. As pointed out by Senator BALL (the New York Times magazine, December 8, 1946) this "* * * would simply empower some man to render arbitrary judgments in disputes between other men. Such a concept is entirely foreign to our liberal system of equal justice, under law. Our courts do not decide cases on the basis of the judge's individual judgment. They apply to a particular dispute a general law defining the rights and duties of the parties and applying equally to all. * * * we would first have to define the court's jurisdiction in the law, deciding what are proper issues * * *. There is no general agreement in the country on either of these questions today, and it is questionable whether in the absence of such general acceptance it would be possible to write such definitions into a law and make it work. It is certain that even the attempt would require many months, probably years, of legislative effort."

Without discussing these proposals further, it is apparent that this Nation cannot wait for its necessary protection to be provided along these lines.

(c) Prohibition of secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes

Such provisions were included in the Case bill. These provisions would have had no effect in preventing disaster to the public from continued exercise of monopolistic power by labor organizations, if either the railway strike of last May or the recent coal strike had continued. Where there is an industry-wide union covering substantially all of the workers in the industry or a union which includes substantially all of even one class of essential workers in a public utility, this remedy would not prevent the use by such labor organizations of monopolistic power to cause disaster to the public.

(d) Abolition or restriction of closed shop

This remedy might accomplish the same purposes in the end as the bill proposed in this report. However, it is believed that this remedy is just as revolutionary as would be a proposal to break up labor organizations having monopolistic power. It is highly controversial, and, even if it could, it would only accomplish the purpose, for which the bill attached to this report is recommended, after a considerable lapse of time.

(e) Government seizure of plants and draft of workers

Plant seizure was adopted as a wartime measure, while drafting of workers was at one time recommended by the President only as a temporary measure. Plant seizure has not been very effective even as a wartime measure since the end of hostilities, and it points toward totalitarianism. Drafting workers has never been suggested as a potential permanent solution of this problem.

(f) Application of the antitrust laws

It has been suggested that these be applied to prohibit simultaneous strikes against, or lock-outs by, two or more employers. In view of the encouragement given over a long period of years to combinations between labor organizations and such activities as industry-wide bargaining, it is believed that this remedy, while it might be effective, would represent too revolutionary a change.

A bill to protect the public from the use of monopolistic power as a weapon in labor disputes

SECTION 1. (a) Every person who shall, individually or in combination or conspiracy with any other person or persons, so monopolize the labor of human beings, or otherwise induce them to refrain from working, as to prevent the supply in or for commerce of a commodity or service to such an extent that severe hardship is or will be inflicted on the public, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year or by both said punishments in the discretion of the court.

(b) With regard to a particular commodity or service, "the public" means the persons who have an interest in the supply in or for commerce of such commodity or service, other than an interest in producing or furnishing it or in being employed to produce or furnish it.

(c) "Commerce" means trade or commerce among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or Territory, or between any insular possessions or other places under the jurisdiction of the United States, or between any such possession or place and any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States.

(d) The words "person" or "persons" shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States, the laws of any of the Territories, the laws of any State or the laws of any foreign country.

SEC. 2. (a) The several district courts of the United States are invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of section 1 and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violators. Such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violations may be enjoined or otherwise prohibited. When the party complained of shall have been duly notified of such petition the court shall proceed as soon as may be to the hearing and determination of the case; and pending such petition and before final decree, the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order as shall be deemed just in the premises.

(b) Where it clearly appears necessary in order to protect the public from severe hardship, the final order of the court enjoining or otherwise prohibiting such violations, or any temporary restraining order issued by the court pursuant to this section, may direct employees engaged in producing or furnishing such commodity or service in or for commerce to return to their posts of duty within a reasonable time to be specified therein, which reasonable time shall be not less than 3 days after the signing of said order. Any employee who willfully fails to return to work within the time so specified or who shall, after the time so specified and while such direction is still in effect, engage in any strike, slow-down or other concerted interruption of operations, shall not thereafter be regarded as an employee of his employer for the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act or the Railway Labor Act, as amended, unless he is subsequently reemployed by his employer.

(c) Whenever it shall appear to the court before which any proceeding under this section 2 may be pending that the ends of justice require that other parties shall be brought before the court, the court may permit them to intervene and become parties or may cause them to be summoned whether they reside in the district where the court is held or not; and subpenas to that end may be served in any district by the marshal thereof.

(d) The court making any final order hereunder shall retain jurisdiction of the cause for the purpose of revising it from time to time as shall be deemed just in the premises upon application of any party thereto.

(e) The power and jurisdiction provided for in this section shall not be limited by the act entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code, to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity and for other purposes," approved March 23, 1932, or by the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

AMERICA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR VANDENBERG

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, one of the great addresses made in the late years on the general subject of the foreign relations of the United States and world affairs was delivered before the Cleveland Foreign Affairs Forum, at Cleveland, Ohio, on Saturday night last, by the distinguished President pro tempore of this body. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Cleveland Forum upon the powerful program it has produced from all quarters of the globe in a striking exchange of international opinion. This process of reciprocal candor is one of the major forces which can beat swords into plowshares on the anvils of mutual understanding and good will. Indeed, this is the supreme potentiality of the organized United Nations. War will remain at a heavy discount so long as international controversy stays in the council chamber and adversaries talk things out instead of shooting them out.

It was my good fortune to coin a phrase at the United Nations San Francisco Conference in 1945 which seems to survive. I prophesied that the General Assembly would become the town meeting of the world. In 1 year it has become exactly that. So long as the town meeting meets, reason is calculated to outweigh force. So long as this safety valve works, the world's boilers are not calculated to explode.

Peace with justice is the dearest aspiration at every hearthstone in the world. Here in your town meeting the voices of global hope have joined in this universal prayer. The voice of our own America must rise above them all, not only because our people deeply share this dedication, but particularly because time and events have given us the tremendous responsibility of a spiritual leadership which most of the world is eager to have us grasp and which we would desert at our own peril.

Tonight, according to your program, the United States replies to the world. So far as my little part in this symposium is concerned, this is too large an order to be filled in 30 minutes. Further, I must make it plain that I am not in a position to reply for the United States because the Constitution confides that prerogative exclusively to the President. The Senate merely advises and consents. Sometimes it doesn't even do that.

Fortunately, the Secretary of State is here to speak for the President. But, unfortunately, he is shortly leaving the public service by resignation. I say this with deep regret. Secretary Byrnes has been an able, efficient, courageous Secretary of State in the finest American tradition. He has relentlessly defended American ideals in crises where they required defense. He has made a great contribution to the welfare of this country and to the peace of the world. I salute him with affection and profound respect; and I hail him as a very great American.

General Marshall, who succeeds him, brings to his task a stout heart, a clear head, and a rich experience. He has always enjoyed the total confidence of Congress and of all his military and civilian colleagues at home and abroad. I wish him well in his great responsibility.

As a junior partner I have worked with Secretary Byrnes on what is called a "bipartisan foreign policy" in the United Nations and in planning European peace. It would be more significant to say we have sought a united American foreign policy so that, despite some inevitable dissidence at home, America could enjoy abroad the enhanced authority of a substantially united front. I dare to believe that, despite some distressing domestic interludes, it has borne rich fruits. In any event, partisan politics, for most of us, stopped at the water's edge. I hope they stay stopped—for the sake of America—regardless of what party is in power. This does not mean that we cannot have earnest, honest, even vehement domestic differences of opinion on foreign policy. It is no curb on free opinion or free speech. But it does mean that they should not root themselves in partisanship. We should ever strive to hammer out a permanent American foreign policy, in basic essentials, which serves all America and deserves the approval of all American-minded parties at all times.

The State Department and the Foreign Service themselves require broad-gaged reorganization to keep pace with America's unavoidable world responsibilities, and particularly to develop more long-range planning so that there need be less catch-as-catch-can improvisation and expediency. Our top representative in the United Nations should be a permanent Under Secretary of State.

But let me get back to that reply to the world. I assume the world chiefly wants to know whether America will persist in its attitudes toward collective peace and security. I cannot answer for others. I will answer for myself.

I believe the United States, in enlightened self-interest, will do everything within its power to sustain organized international defense against aggression; to promote democracy and human rights and fundamental freedoms; and, through international cooperation, to seek peace with justice in a free world of free men.

We plot no conquests. We shall neither condone nor appease the conquests of others. We ask nothing for ourselves except reciprocal fair play. The extent to which it develops will determine our final course. We are not interested in unity at any price. We shall aspire to standards which will rally others to match our zeals. We offer friendship to all. Our reply to the world is a challenge to match us in good works.

Mr. Chairman, these American attitudes will persist because they stem from reason and reality, and we are a practical people. We should remind ourselves, as well as our neighbors, from time to time, of certain facts in this connection lest we suffer in steadfastness what we lose in recollection.

Prior to December 1941 we were conscientiously divided, along lines of deep conviction, regarding our proper role in a world-at-war just as we were similarly divided 20 years before regarding our proper role in a world-at-peace. Pearl Harbor ended that debate. It brought a united country to far-flung battle lines where we swiftly mobilized the greatest fighting resources of all time. It did more. It released an evolution which drove most of us to the irresistible conclusion that world peace is indivisible. We learned that the oceans are no longer moats around our ramports. We learned that mass destruction is a progressive science which defies both time and space and reduces human flesh and blood to cruel impotence. Then we constributed the crowning proof ourselves. In the climax of this tragedy we ourselves devised the atom bomb—an appalling tribute to our illimitable genius—an equally appalling prophecy of civilization's suicide unless World War Three is stopped before it starts. This produced the inevitable conviction that the jungle code of war must be repealed for keeps.

Before the horrors of the conflict had even reached their maximum we brought our major allies together at Dumbarton Oaks to chart the most essential victory of all—a victory over war itself. Oh, yes, we had said these same things once before and they had turned to ashes on our lips. But there is no comparison in the provocation which was our immediate spur. From Dumbarton Oaks we went to San Francisco and at the symbolic Golden Gate the Charter of the United Nations was unanimously approved. From San Francisco we went to Washington and the Senate spectacularly ratified the Charter with but two dissenting votes. We accepted the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. From Washington we went to London and organized the first town meeting of the world. From London we came back to New York, where, in response to congressional invitation the United Nations launched its gigantic adventure on a site in the United States, which thus gives us the permanent peace capital of the world.

This record cannot be misread at home or abroad. We have embraced the United Nations as the heart and core of united, unpartisan American foreign policy. We shall be faithful to the letter and the spirit of these obligations. In my view, this will be true no matter what administration sits in Washington, and it will remain true to whatever extent the United Nations themselves are faithful to our common pledge. That, in general, Mr. Chairman, would be my over-all reply to the world.

But I make the reply with no illusions that now all's well. The United Nations is neither an automatic nor a perfect instrument. Like any other human institution, it will make mistakes. It must live and learn. It must grow from strength to strength. It must earn the ever-expanding confidence and fidelity of people everywhere. It must deserve to survive.

Meanwhile it is definitely beset by hazards. For example, the necessity for unanimity among the Five Great Powers is both strength and weakness to its arm. Strength, because these Great Powers when united are invincible. Weakness, because the excessive use of the veto, particularly in respect to the pacific settlement of disputes, can reduce the whole system to a mockery. It is much too early to talk about major surgery on the Charter itself. But I hope all the Great Powers will voluntarily join in a new procedural interpretation of the Charter to exempt all phases of pacific settlements from what, in such instances, makes of the veto a stultifying checkmate. I pose this as a test of international good faith.

There is another hazard. The organization is beset by fiscal dangers. In the enthusiastic eagerness with which it expands its nobly meditated efforts through specialized agencies, each with its own uncoordinated autonomy, it threatens accumulating, annual assessments which a majority of its member nations soon may be unable to fairly share. In such event, either the burden is concentrated on a few large states or the smaller states drop out. In the former case, the sovereign equality of member states will disappear. In the latter case, the United Nations will become a rich man's club and its greatest genius—universality of membership—will disappear. Stern fiscal control is indispensable—not penury but prudence.

But, Mr. Chairman, we must not be impatient. It took 5 years to take the world apart. It would not be surprising if it took at least that long to put it together again. The remarkable thing is that the United Nations has done so well so soon. Its Security Council has already peacefully tempered many critical situations which, in the absence of its mediation, invited serious implications. The recent dispatch of a committee of inquiry to the Greek border is the latest striking case in point. Meanwhile, its General Assembly has already initiated powerful movements for the common good—incomparably the greatest of which is an approach to mutual disarmament.

These things can be the beginnings of the greatest benediction of all time. They are worth every effort which men of good will can muster. And let's always remember this: The more imponderable the world's frictions may become, the greater the need to persevere in strengthening this one and only available agent of organized emancipation.

And this: If, one day, some aggressor leaves the United Nations, in order to be free of its restraints, the rest of the world has ready-made at hand the well-geared machinery for another, and immediate, grand alliance, swiftly and overwhelmingly to confront the offender. Would-be international assassins, if ever such there be, will not lightly chance such condign disaster.

I spoke of disarmament. No other peace factor is of such vitality; and none could better typify America's attitude toward peace and the world. We are prepared to disarm (1) to whatever extent other powers are dependably ready to make comparable, permanent, and effective renunciations; or (2) in whatever degree the United Nations and its cooperative military resources prove hereafter to offer a reliable substitute. It is our dearest dream. But we shall not dream ourselves into a nightmare. We shall not disarm alone. We shall not trust to the persuasion of our example. We tried that once before. We shall take no sweetness and light for granted in a world where there is still too much iron curtain. We shall not trust alone to fickle words. Too many words at Yalta and at Potsdam have been distorted out of all pretense of integrity. We shall not ignore reality. We do not intend to be at anybody's mercy; nor do we intend to emasculate our authority with those who may still think in terms of force. But we will joyfully match the utmost limits of mutual disarmament to which other Titans will dependably agree, if there be disciplines which guarantee against bad faith; and we will speed the day when such a boon shall deal war its deadliest blow. I repeat, however, that this cannot happen either in ambush or on a one-way street.

Our American proposals regarding atomic bombs illustrate my point. With an investment of $3,000,000,000 in this supreme destroyer of all time, and with a monopoly upon its sinister secret for some years to come, we offer not only to abandon our dominant advantage but also to join in outlawing its destructive use by anybody, any time, anywhere on earth. And what is our price? Just this—an effective system of continuous inspection and control which makes certain that no international brigand shall hereafter break faith with us and with the world. The price is simply protection against treachery. But it is a fixed price, Mr. Chairman, and the price must be paid. We ask nothing for ourselves. We ask everything for peace. I submit, sir, that never had there been a comparable example of national good will, nor one so thrillingly dramatizing the purpose of a great people to live and let live on a peaceful earth, if we are allowed to do so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I briefly touch upon another phase. The economic factors of the peace are of vital interest to the world—and us. Peace and economics are inseparably kin. Unfortunately this area of action is not so clear because the premises themselves are mixed in a clash of economic ideologies. But we shall not draw back from our essential responsibilities. For example, I am sure Congress will make a liberal relief appropriation—to be administered under American auspices in consultation with the United Nations—for the stricken postwar areas which are still war casualties, even though we never again contribute 72 percent of an international fund, as in UNRRA, which can be controlled and even exploited by others. This is said without prejudice to the great and humane achievements of UNRRA despite its handicaps. Again, reasonable rehabilitation credits are unavoidable if democratic stabilities are to be restored before it is too late. By way of another example, I believe we shall continue the device of reciprocal trade agreements, in one form or another, to release and expand mutual trade—an even greater need for us than for any other country because our vastly expanded national economy and employment require it. Whether this can continue on its present multilateral basis will depend somewhat upon the type of competition we confront from foreign state monopolies and from a growing habit abroad of making bilateral agreements for political as well as economic purposes. These habits could force us into defensive tactics which we would not voluntarily embrace. We shall fit our procedures to the necessities which are forced upon us. Certainly we intend to keep our own American industry and agriculture in sound, domestic health, and to protect our system of free enterprise. Anything less would be a calamity not only for us but for the Western World. But sane, healthy, mutual trade expansion is best for all concerned.

Mr. Chairman, my time runs out though I have touched only the outer rim of our mutual problems with the world. I conclude with a few swift overtones.

We have finished five treaties with ex-enemy European states. They passed in review before a peace conference of 21 nations in Paris. We are entitled to say that this broad consultation of all our battle allies was an achievement primarily due to American insistence. Here, again, is an unmistakable cue to our international disposition ever to recognize the rights of little states as well as big. Here also is a cue to what seems to be our improved relations with the Soviet Unions—as a result, I believe, of our present rugged policy of firm but friendly candor which I hope has permanently established the American doctrine that there are deadlines in our ideals from which we shall never again retreat. This is not truculence; it is the power of brave and naked truth. When we left Paris in September the Council of Foreign Ministers was deadlocked on more than 40 issues. When we left New York in December they were all amicably resolved. These five treaties are far from satisfactory in many aspects. But they bear no remote resemblance to the greater dissatisfactions which we have prevented, and they are a great advance toward reconstruction in a peaceful world.

Now we turn, after many weary months of urging, to peace plans for Austria and Germany. At long last, we shall come to grips with the heart of the European problem. All occupying powers should recognize the independence of Austria and withdraw their troops. In Germany, retarded by Russian and French refusals to fulfill the Potsdam requirement that the four zones of German occupation should operate as an economic unit, the German situation has suffered such economic deterioration as to threaten chaos and disaster. We have partially met this worsening crisis by unifying the American and British zones—with an invitation to the French and Russians to join us at their option. This is a hopeful pattern. Meanwhile the business of renewed, decentralized political autonomy—looking toward federated states which shall be the masters and not the servants of a new Berlin—makes encouraging progress in the American zone. But the pressing need is a plan for total peace—a plan which omits no possible precautions against recurrent Hitlerism, yet which offers some reward other than eternal degredation to new German states when they faithfully strive toward democratic self-redemption. The important thing for the world to know is that we intend to remain in occupation until this job is done. It is part of the war, if we are to preserve our victory.

Meanwhile, we face the intimate necessity of refreshing our indispensable pan-American solidarity. This comes close to home. It is historically basic in American foreign policy; and nothing has happened to lessen the importance of these good neighborly contacts. Quite the contrary. At San Francisco, 20 Latin-American Republics were unwilling to proceed with the United Nations Charter until the validity of our historic regional arrangements were officially tied into the United Nations plan. This was specifically done in chapter VIII of the Charter. Thereupon, the then Secretary of State, Mr. Stettinius, as part of the agreed plan, promised "to invite the other American Republics to undertake in the near future the negotiation of a treaty which, as provided for in the Act of Chapultepec itself, would be consistent with the Charter of world organization and would support and strengthen that organization, while at the same time advancing the development of the historic system of inter-American cooperation."

That was on May 15, 1945. This is January 11, 1947. "In the near future" has not yet arrived. The Secretary said of the proposed conference that "it would be another important step in carrying forward the good-neighbor policy." If he was right—and I think he was—this long failure to hold the conference has had the opposite effect. I am well aware of the reasons for delay. I entirely sympathize with the anxiety to purge the Americas of their last vestige of nazism. But I think that, under a dozen solemn pan-American treaties to which we are a party, this is a multilateral decision which should always be made by all of us jointly and not influenced or dictated by us alone. In some aspects it can be said that we have been proceeding jointly. But I think it is past time to hold the Pan-American conference which we promised in 1945, and there to formally renew the joint New World authority which is the genius of our New World unity. There is too much evidence that we are drifting apart—and that a Communistic upsurge is moving in. We face no greater need than to restore the warmth of New World unity which reached an all-time high at San Francisco.

I devote a few parting sentences to the Far East, where General MacArthur is doing so magnificent a job in Tokyo that our daily headlines scarcely remind us that we are successfully liquidating the greatest single postwar task which fell to our primary responsibility, and where the young Philippine Republic arises as a monument, not only to its own vigorous self-development but also to our steadfast, anti-imperialistic American liberalism, which defies successful libel, either at home or abroad. But it is particularly China to which I dedicate this paragraph.

Here lies a vast and friendly republic, rich in wisdom, equally rich in its democratic promise for tomorrow, and historically fixed in the orbit of our good will. Since 1911, when Dr. Sun Yat-sen gave China her new vision, she has been struggling, against bitter odds, toward the light of a new day. While recognizing the Nationalist government of Chiang Kai-shek, we have—through a year's mission headed by our distinguished General Marshall—been impartially urging that it produce unity with a rival armed party—the Chinese Communists. Under the determined leadership of Chiang Kai-shek, a national assembly has just produced a new constitution and the government has been reorganized with a coalition of non-Communist parties. We can hope that this Nanking charter, with its first great national election promised before next Christmas, will weld together a strong and competent China. It is my own view that our own far-eastern policy might well now shift its emphasis. While still recommending unity, it might well encourage those who have so heroically set their feet upon this road, and discourage those who make the road precarious. Our marines, having finished their task, are coming home. But there will never be a minute when China's destiny is not of acute concern to the United States and to a healthy world.

My fellow citizens, we face a new year in world affairs, with many gnawing problems still unsolved all round this turbulent globe. I have touched only a few which have special significance in respect to the topic of the evening. Peace is more difficult to win than was the war. Even we ourselves cannot yet claim convalescence. It is not strange if other lands, torn asunder by physical destruction, desperately rocked by disintegration, perhaps still ridden with alien troops and unwelcome overlords, perhaps unable to reerect their family shrines, reunite their families or even find decent subsistence for their families, perhaps unable to resist the subversive invasion of alien tyranny and terrorism—it is not strange if other lands are prey to a restlessness which stalks the earth and offers sanctuary to creeds of deliberate chaos and confusion. There is nothing but peril—for the United States of America—in neglecting our vigilant attention to these ugly facts. On the other hand, we have a right to clear ourselves with some very real encouragements. The greatest of these—and I end as I began—is the luminous fact that 55 nations are committed by solemn covenant to help each other keep the peace, to substitute law for force, and to strive toward the uplift and defense of human rights and justice and fundamental freedoms. The world has far to go before this pledge is a reliable reality. But the United Nations has raised this standard to which men of good will in every clime and under every flag can repair, and it has already sped us on this God-blessed way. America will do her full part.

CREATION OF WORLD PEACE—ADDRESS BY SECRETARY OF STATE BYRNES

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there also be printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes, in Cleveland, Ohio on the same occasion.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This coming of age anniversary of the Cleveland Council on World Affairs is of more than usual significance. Under the leadership of President Emeny of the Council, the community of Cleveland has come to regard world problems not as the affairs of far-distant countries, but as the affairs of the world of which the community of Cleveland is a part.

Twice in our generation the communities of America have learned that they are very much a part of the world when the world is at war. If we are to prevent war and build enduring peace, every community in America must realize that it is very much a part of the world when the world is at peace.

Our first task is to liquidate the war. We cannot think constructively about the building of lasting peace and about rising standards of life until we give the peoples of this world a chance to live again under conditions of peace. We cannot deal with the problems of a convalescing world until we get the patient off the operating table.

That is why President Truman and I at Potsdam 2 months after VE-day proposed to set up the Council of Foreign Ministers to start work upon the peace treaties as quickly as possible, wherever possible.

That is why we have persistently urged since last winter that deputies should be appointed to begin work upon the German and Austrian treaties.

BARS RETREAT TO ISOLATION

After every great war the victorious Allies have found it difficult to adjust their differences in the making the peace. At the very outset grave differences between the Allies did arise in the work of the Council of Foreign Ministers. But we refused to abandon the principles for which our country stands. And we served notice that we would not retreat to a policy of isolation.

We made it clear that, as anxious as we were to reduce the burden of occupation, America would not evade her responsibility. And we also made it clear that as long as our allies maintained troops in Germany and Austria, the United States would maintain its troops in those countries.

We were determined to do our part to bring peace to a war-weary world and we have not sought any excuse, however plausible, for shirking our responsibilities.

The treaties with Italy and the ex-satellite states, as they emerged from months of protracted negotiation and debate, are not perfect. But they are as good as we can hope to get by general agreement now or within a reasonable length of time.

The treaties mark a milestone on the return to conditions of peace. The fact that the Allies have been able to agree upon these five treaties does give hope that they will soon be able to agree upon a treaty with Austria. That will make possible the removal of occupation troops from all European countries except Germany, and will give to millions of people relief from the burdens of occupying armies.

FAVORABLE CONDITIONS SEEN

Agreement upon these treaties gives assurance, too, that the discussions of the German settlement will start under much more favorable conditions than seemed possible until last month.

During the year or more that these treaties were under discussion it was inevitable that the differences between the Allies should be emphasized, and at times exaggerated. On the other hand, during the war some of these differences were minimized and overlooked. But peace cannot be made by ignoring very real and basic differences and by pretending that they do not exist.

By recognizing and bringing out into the open our differences and honestly seeking means of reconciling them we have advanced and not retarded the cause of peace.

The discussions and debates in the Council of Foreign Ministers and in the Security Council during the past year caused a better understanding of our problems and contributed much to the substantial progress made at the recent assembly of the United Nations.

But we would never have made the progress that we did during the last year if the American people had not been united on a foreign policy.

For the past year our foreign policy has not been the policy of a political party, it has been the policy of the United States.

VANDENBERG'S HELP PRAISED

And I am sure my Democratic friend, Senator CONNALLY, would join me in saying that our bipartisan foreign policy was made possible only by the wholehearted and intelligent cooperation of my Republican friend, Senator ARTHUR VANDENBERG.

I would issue a word of caution against excessive optimism and excessive pessimism.

We must not let ourselves believe that peace can be made secure by any one treaty or series of treaties, or by any one resolution or series of resolutions. And we must not let ourselves believe that the struggle for peace is hopeless, because we cannot at once find ways and means of reconciling all our differences.

Nations, like individuals, differ as to what is right and just, and clashing appeals to reason may in the long run do more to avert a clash of arms than a lot of pious resolutions which conceal honest and serious disagreements.

Never before have the differences between nations been brought out into the open and so frankly discussed in public as they have during the past year in the Council of Foreign Ministers, the Security Council, and the General Assembly.

Of course, it is true that public discussion emphasizes differences. But without such public discussion the people of the world who want peace would not know and understand the differences which arise between nations and which threaten the peace.

Wars may start not because the people want war but because they want things that other people possess and will not give up without a fight. Full and frank discussion of such situations may avert armed conflict.

A NEVER-ENDING STRUGGLE

The struggle for peace is the struggle for law and justice. It is a never-ending struggle. Law and justice can be developed and applied only through living institutions capable of life and growth. And these institutions must be backed by sufficient force to protect nations which abide by the law against nations which violate the law.

If we are going to build a regime of law among nations, we must struggle to create a world in which no nation can arbitrarily impose its will upon any other nation. Neither the United States nor any other state should have the power to dominate the world.

The present power relationships of the great states preclude the domination of the world by any one of them. Those power relationships cannot be substantially altered by the unilateral action of any one state without profoundly disturbing the whole structure of the United Nations.

Therefore, if we are going to do our part to maintain peace under law, we must maintain, in relation to other states, the military strength necessary to discharge our obligations.

Force does not make right, but we must realize that in this imperfect world power as well as reason does affect international decisions.

SPECIAL RESPONSIBILITY CITED

The great states are given special responsibility under the Charter because they have the military strength to maintain peace if they have the will to maintain peace. Their strength in relation to one another is such that no one of them can safely break the peace if the others stand united in defense of the Charter.

We have joined with our allies in the United Nations to put an end to war. We have covenanted not to use force except in defense of law. We shall keep that covenant.

As a great power and as a permanent member of the Security Council, we have a responsibility, veto or no veto, to see that other states do not use force except in defense of law. We must discharge that responsibility.

And we must realize that unless the great powers are not only prepared to observe the law but are prepared to act in defense of the law the United Nations cannot prevent war.

In a world in which people do differ as to what is right and wrong, we must strive to work out definite standards of conduct which all can accept. We must develop and build through the years a common law of nations.

History informs us that individuals abandoned private wars and gave up their arms only as they were protected by the common law of their tribes and their nations. So I believe that in the long run international peace depends upon our ability to develop a common law of nations which all nations can accept and which no nation can violate with impunity.

In the past, international law has concerned itself too much with the rules of war and too little with the rules of peace. I am more interested in ways and means to prevent war than in ways and means to conduct war.

COMMON LAW FOR ALL ASKED

Unless we are able to develop a common law of nations which provides definite and agreed standards of conduct such as those which govern decisions within the competence of the International Court of Justice and such as those which we hope may be agreed upon for the control of atomic energy, international problems between sovereign states must be worked out by agreement between sovereign states.

The United States has taken the lead in proposing the control and the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and other weapons of mass destruction under agreed rules of law.

These rules of law must carry clear and adequate safeguards to protect complying states from the hazards of violations and evasions. They must be sufficiently definite and explicit to prevent a state that violates the law from obstructing the prompt and effective enforcement of the law.

If a nation by solemn treaty agrees to a plan for the control of atomic weapons and agrees that a violation of that treaty shall be punished, it is difficult for me to understand why that nation cannot agree to waive the right to exercise the veto power should it be charged with violating its treaty obligation.

In 1821, while a Member of the House, I advocated that the President call a conference for the limitation of naval armaments.

Later the President did call such a conference. What happened thereafter influences my thinking today. While America scrapped battleships, Japan scrapped blueprints. America will not again make that mistake.

INSISTS AGREEMENTS BE KEPT

We have urged a general limitation of armaments, but we are not going to disarm while others remain armed. And we should make certain that all governments live up to their agreements to disarm.

We have urged priority for the control of atomic weapons because they are the most destructive of all weapons; because we have been at work on the proposal for more than 6 months; and because it presents concretely the issue of international inspection and control. We are convinced that if there can be agreement on that subject, there can be agreement on the control of other major weapons and a general reduction of armaments.

But international law in a friendly, peaceful world must rest upon something more than mere rules, something more than force and something more than fear. It must be made to rest upon the growth of a common fellowship, common interests, and common ideas among the peoples of this earth.

It was our fostering of a common fellowship that gave vitality to the good-neighbor policy in the Americas. It was a common fellowship which made the Act of Chapultepec possible.

We are eager to proceed with a negotiation of a mutual assistance treaty in accordance with the Act of Chapultepec at the projected Rio de Janeiro conference. But we do not wish to proceed without Argentina, and neither our Ambassador nor any official of the State Department is of the opinion that Argentina has yet complied with the commitments which she as well as the other American republics at Chapultepec agreed to carry out.

HOPES ARGENTINA WILL COMPLY

It is our earnest hope that before long there will be such reasonable and substantial compliance by Argentina with its obligations, that the American Republics, after consultation, will convene the Rio conference.

A common fellowship does not mean that nations must in all respects think alike or live alike. Inevitably, we will differ. But nations like individuals must respect and tolerate one another's differences.

Peace in this interdependent world must be something more than a truce between nations. To have peace, nations must learn to live and work together for their common good. We live in one world. The health of the body politic like the health of the human body depends upon the health of all its members.

We cannot whole-heartedly abandon the policy of political isolation unless we abandon the policy of economic isolation. We are not likely to be successful in our efforts to cooperate to prevent war, unless we are willing to cooperate to maintain freedom and well-being in a world at peace.

We must learn to cooperate so that the people of each country may exchange the products of their country easily and fairly with the people of other countries.

Although our general long-run purpose is to help raise the living standard, the immediate problem during the last 2 years in some areas has been to maintain life itself.

DISTRESS ABROAD STRESSED

Economic distress, starvation, and disease breed political unrest, tyranny, and agression. If we are sincere in our efforts to maintain peace, we must do our part to assist in the elimination of conditions which breed aggression and war.

If we want people to value freedom and respect law we must at least give them a fair chance to feed, clothe, and shelter themselves and their families.

The war has devastated many countries and disrupted their economics. UNRRA has helped these countries through their most critical period. Its authority is terminated but some countries through no fault of their own will require further relief to get upon their feet. And this we must not deny them.

Outright relief by us is necessary in some countries. But the countries in need and the extent of the need can be determined by the United States just as well as it could be determined by a committee composed of representatives of other governments.

A permanent place on the relief rolls is not the desire of those self-respecting nations which have fought for their freedom. But much of their productive capacity has been destroyed, and they have no working capital in the form of foreign exchange to start the flow of needed raw materials.

They do need loans to secure the raw materials, capital equipment, and tools necessary to rebuild and resume their ability to produce. The work of the International Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and our own Export-Import Bank must continue to have our wholehearted support.

SCIENTIFIC AIDS EMPHASIZED

Despite the ravages and destruction of the war, the advance of science makes it possible for us and other nations to preserve and increase our living standards if we work together with other nations to produce what we and other nations want and need.

We must learn that prosperity like freedom must be shared, not on the basis of handouts, but on the basis of fair and honest exchange of the products of the labor of free men and free women.

We believe that there should be no unnecessary barriers to the free exchange of ideas and information among nations. But it is unrealistic to expect to have trade in ideas if we are unwilling to have trade in goods.

We must do our part to break down the artificial barriers to trade and commerce among nations. We must pursue vigorously our reciprocal trade policies which are designed to expand American trade and world trade because the world cannot buy from us if we are not willing to buy from the world.

We must pursue vigorously our proposed charter for the establishment of an international trade organization. That charter is designed to avoid economic warfare between nations and to insure equality of commercial opportunity for all nations, both large and small. We must avoid economic blocs if we wish to avoid political blocs.

After every great war there comes a period of disillusionment. Those who fight together expect too much from one another and are inclined to give too little to one another.

They forget that victory in war can only give the opportunity which would otherwise be denied, to live and work for the fruits of peace and freedom.

ADMITS DISCOURAGEMENTS

I admit that during the past year there were times when I was deeply discouraged. Our repeated efforts to achieve cooperation in a peaceful world seemed to be meeting only with constant rebuff. But we persisted in our efforts with patience and with firmness.

Today I am happy to say that I am more confident than at any time since VJ-day that we can achieve a just peace by cooperative effort if we persist "with firmness in the right as God gives us the power to see the right."

We have demonstrated our capacity in war. We must demonstrate our capacity in peace. If we do, our children and the children of men everywhere can inherit a peaceful world of expanding freedom and increased well-being.

To that goal freedom's past inspires us and freedom's future calls us.

LABOR COURTS—ARTICLE BY SENATOR FERGUSON

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the February issue of the American magazine contains an able discussion of the proposal for labor courts as supported by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON]. I ask unanimous consent to have it reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY NOT LABOR COURTS?

(By United States Senator HOMER FERGUSON)

Four times within the past year our Nation has come perilously close to complete paralysis because certain of our industrial and labor captains could not settle their disputes peaceably.

During the steel strike, during the rail strike, and during two different coal strikes 140,000,000 Americans stood by helplessly as our magnificent industrial system began grinding to a stop.

The last coal strike marks the eighth time in 5 years that a private citizen has threatened to deprive his Nation of its major source of industrial power. During each of these eight times at least 25,000,000 American workers, aside from miners, have faced the prospect of unemployment.

Even more discouraging, we have seen, during these seemingly innumerable industrial crises, the spectacle of the President of our Nation trying to intervene to bring peace, only to be defied or abused for his efforts. As far as industrial disputes are concerned we are in a state of near-anarchy. Our Government, in this area, has lost its power to govern.

This situation has become intolerable. We cannot afford a national paralysis every few months, simply because labor and industrial managers cannot agree on a contract, or on the interpretation of one made by them.

As a former judge, it does not make sense to me that modern-day America should have to endure public brawling, even if the brawling is done by sovereign giants of capital and labor.

Labor disputes should be settled where all our other domestic disputes are settled—in court. When two private citizens, a landlord and a tenant, for example, fall into disagreement over the terms of a lease, they are not permitted to fight it out in the public streets. If they did, they would be jailed for disturbing the peace or for disorderly conduct. Instead, they take their problem to court. And when the judge pronounces the decision they abide by it. Justice has spoken.

Why are labor-management disputes any different from tenant-landlord disputes except that the issues are bigger, more people are involved, and the economic security of the Nation is endangered?

Basically, they are the same. The difference is in the handling of the issues. Industrial disputes are still settled on the basis of economic power. Which side can outstrangle the other in a showdown? And nowadays these strangle holds cover such wide areas that the public's neck is usually included.

The time has come to settle these disputes on the basis of justice instead of on the basis of strangle holds.

I think we should subject industrial disputes, along with all other disputes, to the legal discipline of a civilized society.

After talking with representatives of both labor and management and with representatives of both major political parties I have worked out a plan to set up a system of American labor courts.

These courts would parallel our regular Federal courts, and would judge every dispute on the basis of justice. All labor contracts affecting interstate commerce would be filed with these courts, and whenever disagreements arose concerning the terms set down the judges would help the parties arrive at a settlement.

If they failed to arrive at such a settlement the court would hold public hearing as in any other case, and then make a decision which would be binding on all parties to the contract. Furthermore, where basic industries or interstate public utilities were involved, and the parties were unable to reach an agreement on a contract to start with, the courts would resolve the matter and the decisions of the court would be final.

This amounts to compulsory arbitration in these basic industries. I see no other remedy when the Nation is faced with a monopoly, either of labor or of management, which can paralyze the industrial life of the country.

Such drastic penalties would be available to ensure enforcement that neither party would seriously consider defying the labor courts, just as today contestants never consider defying the decisions of any of our other courts.

I believe that such a system of labor courts offers a fair, sane, and sensible solution to one of the two big problems facing the Nation today: Recurrent industrial crises.

The other problem is to find a solution to the recurrent wars that afflict the world in which we live. When you consider it, the two problems are almost identical.

Wars, the nations of the world have decided, have become too expensive to tolerate any longer. The nations are moving now at Lake Success to set up a structure to outlaw wars. They have created the United Nations and the International Court of Justice. And they have created a forum and are building the machinery with which to solve future international issues on the basis of justice rather than on the slugging power of the nations involved.

The nations are making progress, and I hope and pray that they succeed. If they do, the world, under justice, can move on to peace and prosperity for all.

It took two horrible wars to convince the world that wars are outdated and must be outlawed. Similarly, it took the recent series of catastrophic strikes to convince the American public that strikes in basic industries are as outdated as wars, and must somehow be outlawed.

Strikes, like wars, have become too expensive. And just as innocent civilians are now the main victims of wars, they are the main victims of strikes.

Most people will grant that strikes once had their proper role in our economy, but that time is rapidly passing. Today, our economy is so intermeshed, and both unions and industries have grown so big, that a single strike can paralyze the Nation.

A strike in the steel industry (or a lockout by management) not only affects the steel workers and their families, but it also affects every one of the literally thousands of industries that use steel in their products, whether automobiles, toy trains, or fence posts.

And it no longer takes a big strike to paralyze a large section of our Nation. The more than 7,000,000 residents of New York City, for example, found that a strike of a mere 6,000 tugboat operators could, and did, bring them to their knees. They were put under virtual martial law as churches, schools, theaters, and business houses were instructed to close.

Or again, when truck drivers entering their city with food supplies went on strike, they were deprived of fresh vegetables, meats, fruits, and medicines. The trucking tie-up afflicted virtually every shop and business in the city and caused losses of business runnng literally into billions of dollars. Yet the dispute was between the trucks' drivers and owners.

We do not have to decide that either union leaders or industrialists are to "blame" for the series of strikes we have had to suffer in order to decide that we need a forum and machinery with which to settle labor disputes.

The blame rests on us as a whole for allowing unions and industries to exist in our midst as sovereign powers.

Given such sovereignty and such conflicting interests, strikes probably are inevitable, just as wars are inevitable when there are no laws that nations abide by. Both capital and labor want to get all they can, and, lacking restraints, will do so.

If recently labor has been more to blame than capital, it is because labor has come up to, if not surpassed, capital in the economic power it can wield in a show-down. For years capital was ruthless and domineering. It formed monopolies and it exploited labor. Since 1929, however, labor has been on the ascendant, and now has its own monopolies and its own domineering attitude among some of its leaders. It, too, has its lobbies, and powerful ones, in Washington.

Lacking any standard for judging issues except force, labor has become increasingly aggressive. Rival unions raid one another, and their leaders often compete with one another to see which can force the largest concessions from management. Every aggressive union leader who demonstrates that he can "get away with" a crippling strike which forces new concessions from management sets a precedent that rival leaders feel they must imitate, or perish. Some leaders demonstrate admirable restraint and awareness of their new responsibilities, but some do not.

I have heard it argued by those who oppose any change in the present "voluntary" system of handling strikes that everything will work out all right once we have an "aroused public interest." Frankly, I don't think that an aroused public interest fazes the Petrillos or the Bridgeses in the least.

Public opinion is aroused. In fact, it is close to the boiling point. Opinion is so aroused that it may force through punitive laws that may throttle labor so completely that capital will again have the upper hand.

But that is not the solution. We would start building toward the same economic war all over again. What we need is a sane program, fair to both sides, that will still give the long-suffering public a break, and let the country get on with its reconversion.

Lately I've been hearing a great many proposals to curb labor by prohibiting this or that. I hear, for example:

"Pass a law forbidding monopoly in labor."

"Pass a law prohibiting the closed shop."

"Pass a law outlawing secondary boycotts."

"Pass a law prohibiting coercion of individual workers by violence through mass picketing."

Some of these have merit, but if passed there would be no machinery with which to carry them out. Passing such laws will not get at the basic problem, which is to provide the machinery and a forum where disputes can be settled decisively short of conflict.

Such a machinery is available in the labor courts which I suggest.

The appealing thing about a court system, to me, is that it is simple, clear-cut, understandable—and, most of all, fair. It is neither antilabor nor antimanagement, but rather is pro-everybody. Our courts have long been admired as symbols of impartial justice, and I believe that the labor courts would soon likewise become such symbols.

The labor-court system, incidentally, has been tried in such countries as Australia, New Zealand, and France, and has worked out very well for all concerned.

Here, briefly, is how the labor-court system might work: There would be district labor courts, circuit courts of appeal, and finally a supreme court of labor. The judges would be appointed by the President and approved by the Senate. They would receive up to $15,000 a year.

There would be three judges in each district court, five or seven in each circuit court of appeals, and nine in the supreme court. In all these, the lay judges would always outnumber the legal judges by one, because of the many questions of fact that would come before the labor courts. And in all cases they would be selected for their fair-mindedness.

Any representative of labor or management, whether he was a lawyer or not, could appear before this bar.

Unions and management would still negotiate their contracts by collective bargaining, just as they do today. If they can arrive at mutually agreeable contracts without help, fine. When they can't, they can call upon the judges to act as conciliators or arbitrators, or they can call in outside intermediaries.

The main thing is that they arrive at some agreement. It is hoped that all negotiators will be able to arrive at agreement, with the help of such machinery. But if a basic industry engaged in interstate commerce or an interstate public utility is involved, a contract must be reached. There can be no strikes in such industries. If the parties cannot agree on terms of the contract, then the courts will arbitrate, and the decisions of the court will be final.

What industries should be subject to such compulsory arbitration? I believe congressional hearings should be held to decide which ones to include. However, I believe that at least these eight should be included. Basic steel, coal, oil, gas (when crossing State lines), all maritime shipping, railroads, electric power, telephone and telegraph.

Perhaps eventually the court system will work out so well that the public will want all industries to come under this compulsory arbitration. The reason I make a division is that it might put too much of a load on the courts at the start to make them responsible for peace on the whole industrial front. So we should start where strikes have the most devastating effect on our economy.

However, once a contract is made, in whatever industry engaged in interstate commerce, it must be filed with the courts. And once it is filed, any future disputes about changing the contract or about its interpretation must be argued before the court. And the decision of the judges must be final.

Thus, if John L. Lewis became dissatisfied with his contract, as he did recently, he would have to establish before the courts that he had a legal right to cancel the contract. If the courts decided the contract could not be canceled without the operators' consent, that would be the end of it.

The enforcement provisions available to the courts would insure that! There would be no defiance—at least, not if he wanted to continue to be a labor leader.

Law without enforcement is a mockery. Any representative of labor or industry who defied the verdicts of the court would be prohibited from appearing before the courts in the future. He would have taken from him the right to negotiate any contracts. In short, he would be disbarred, just as a lawyer guilty of malpractice may be disbarred.

Furthermore, the courts would be empowered to levy heavy fines against corporations or unions that refused to abide by their decrees.

In order that undue hardship would not be inflicted on either side in a dispute, provision should be made that the courts be required to pass down decision within a few days of the time a case is filed with them. Speedy justice is essential.

To a lot of people, including industrialists and workingmen alike, one great appeal of the court system is that it would end the current flood of little pesky strikes arising from differing interpretations of contract.

I talked recently to a taxicab driver in my home town of Detroit who said he quit a higher-paying job with a big auto-making company because men in his department were continually being called out on strike. Perhaps a man would be discharged for shooting dice in the washroom. So out the whole department would go on strike until he was reinstated. These 3-day strikes added up.

If courts were available to rule on the justice of the discharge there would be no necessity for strikes.

Again, men are often called out on strike in a jurisdictional dispute with another union. Perhaps a steamfitters' union and a carpenters' union both feel they should fasten a certain pipe to a wall. Let the courts decide which, instead of the men sulking on strike.

There will be those who will say that the scheme is impracticable because no court composed of human beings is capable of arriving at just decisions involving such complex matters as arise in industrial disputes. I can say to this that during my 14 years on the bench I was required to reach decisions on all types of cases, including labor disputes—and found the latter no more difficult than many of the others.

Some labor people may be apprehensive of the proposal I have outlined because it interferes, as far as persons in basic industries are concerned, with their right to strike. They consider this right to strike as sacred. It should be if they hav no other means of getting a fair deal, as is true at present. But if they are assured of justice through the courts, they should be delighted to adopt this less expensive substitute, which will be their guarantee of economic security. Furthermore, this would not prevent any man or woman from quitting his or her job.

I shall have to acknowledge that the court set-up would take away some of the labor leader's glory in mapping strike strategy and in "talking tough" to management and to government. But he would have an even greater opportunity to serve his constituents constructively. The courts would give him a better forum than he now has for presenting his case to the public. His task would be to present the best possible case for his men to the courts. To my mind, there is no question that workers should organize and be represented by spokesmen of their own choosing—as management should represent the stockholders in the industry.

In a sense, the court structure would be an encouragement to unionism because the courts would not function except where the employees of a company had a spokesman empowered to represent their collective interests. Sanctity of contract through decisions of a labor court would enhance the security of both labor and industry and also protect the interests of the general public.

And management should like the court set-up if for no other reason than that it would permit its leaders to plan better for the future if they were assured that production would not be interrupted periodically by strikes.

I have a suspicion that if the labor-court plan is put into practice we shall see a great reduction in the bickering and feuding between capital and labor. They both will no longer need to have chips on their shoulders to protect their interests, because they will know that their rights are assured by the presence in the background of the labor courts.

Furthermore, both sides will know that if they have to state their case in a public forum before the court they will not raise issues unless they know they have a good case. And they will know, further, that they will not be able to becloud the issues by emotional appeals, as they often can now.

The great principle which has shaped America's growth for a century and a half is that of equal justice under law. I believe that if we are to fulfill our destiny as a people it is time we broaden application of the principle to include labor-management relations.

Let justice, and not power politics, reign in our workshops!

ORDER DISPENSING WITH CALL OF THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is concluded. The calendar, under rule VIII, is now in order.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I understand that there are on the calendar two resolutions about which there has been some discussion heretofore. I further understand that on the call of the calendar on Monday, debate would be limited to 5 minutes. In the circumstances I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar today be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PROPOSED CONTINUATION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEES

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I shall speak today on a subject which I deem of very great importance in this epoch in the affairs of the Eightieth Congress. It has to do with the two resolutions which were reported by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS] on last Friday; namely, Senate Resolution 46 and Senate Resolution 20.

I realize, as I rise to speak, a consciousness that I am out of step, so to speak, with the majority of my party in what I am about to say. I aver that it is a delightful thing to be able to say, as was said of old, "How pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity"; but when unity is brought about at the expense of one's convictions, one has no recourse but to express his convictions for what influence they may generate.

This is an important occasion. I have written my views on Senate Resolution 46, so that there may be no possible misconception of the thoughts which I am about to express.

The Congress is organized under circumstances which more than ever turn the attention of the country to our handiwork. The Congress is now in the majority control of the Republican Members. Furthermore, the Congress is meeting under the terms of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946. Thus, both in terms of party and with respect to the legislative framework of its activities, the Eightieth Congress is meeting under new auspices.

The public at large and the Members of Congress themselves are keenly watching to see in what direction we will set our faces, and what goals we will seek to achieve.

The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 was the sincere expression of the will of the people. For years, even for decades, Congress had been criticized for inefficiencies and for muddling and confusion. Congress was the butt of every cartoonist and of every maker of jests. This constant wearing away of the prestige of Congress was not healthy for the activities of its Members or for the country at large. To this confusion, this muddling, and this widespread criticism, Congress sought to put an end when it enacted the statute which became law on August 2, 1946.

All over the United States newspapers published editorials, columnists published articles, and radio commentators made statements praising Congress for the eneactment of this statute and for the introduction of true efficiency into the workings of Congress.

Among the greatest gains registered by this statute were the elimination of conditions that made for inefficiency, waste, and confusion. Above all, such conditions centered around the multiplicity of congressional committees, and the overlapping of their respective jurisdiction.

The bill for the reorganization of Congress was directed specifically to those unfortunate conditions.

In two widely publicized reports, the attention of Congress was specifically called to the effort to remove the inefficiencies and waste resulting from those conditions.

In Report No. 1011, dated March 4, 1946, the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress dealt with the whole subject of congressional reorganization. The first and principal subject it discussed was the structure and operation of the congressional committees. The joint committee said to both Houses of Congress:

> Your committee believes that no adequate improvement in the organization of Congress can be undertaken or effected unless Congress first reorganizes its present obsolete and overlapping committee structure. This is the first and most important test of whether Congress is willing to strengthen itself and its organization to carry the tremendous work load that present-day governmental problems place upon it.
> About 90 percent of all the work of the Congress on legislative matters is carried on in these committees. Most bills recommended by congressional committees become laws of the land and the content of legislation finally passed is largely determined in the committees.
> We feel that there is nothing sacrosanct in the present arrangement of our committees. A study of the committee system of both Houses reveals that since the First Congress the committees have undergone many realinements and changes as conditions demanded. As "the workshop of Congress" the committee structure, more than any other arm of the legislative branch, needs frequent modernization to bring its efficiency up to the requirements of the day.
> However, because of obvious difficulties attendant upon the reduction of standing committees, Congress for many years past has neglected to survey its over-all needs for a more effective system. New committees have been established to do particular jobs, but little attention has been paid to realinement of committees and their jurisdictions on an over-all basis.
> Congress can no longer afford the luxury and waste of manpower and time in maintaining a total of 33 standing committees of the Senate and 48 standing committees of the House. We recognize the difficulties inherent in simplifying this old system of 81 standing committees. We realize that loyalties to these present committees, certain perquisites of membership upon them, established seniority rights, and a desire to maintain these traditional rights make reorganization of our committee structure the No. 1 problem to be faced in any attempt to modernize and strengthen the Congress.
> Only by untangling the existing overlapping jurisdictional lines and merging standing committees which today have almost concurrent jurisdiction can present-day legislation be adequately handled. We have attempted in the following recommendation to merge closely related committees into one where their jurisdictions overlap or where they deal with similar subjects.

The report proposed a reduction of the number of committees and the clear specification of the respective jurisdiction of the various committees. The joint report then went on to say:

> Composed of the directly elected representatives of the people, Congress needs to improve its lines of communication, its relationships, its understanding of the departments. At present there is no regular machinery of cooperation between them, aside from inadequate informal conversations or correspondence or a full-dress investigation, by which the common problems of governmental policy can be surveyed.
> Vast powers are often necessarily delegated to governmental agencies. Sometimes the laws are not clear or specific and sometimes a problem defies specific legal description and adequate limitation. A clear and continuing understanding of the objectives and methods of the departments should be achieved.
> We feel that this oversight problem can be handled best by directing the regular standing committees of the Senate and House, which have such matters in their jurisdiction, to conduct a continuous review of the agencies administering laws originally reported by the committees. Frequent consultation with and reporting to the committees would greatly improve relationships between the executive and legislative branches.
> Directing the regular standing committees to carry on this supervisory function appeals to your committee as a better method than the appointment of numerous select investigating committees when situations have grown so difficult as to arouse public demand for correction or special study. We recommend that the practice of creating special committees of investigation be abandoned.
> Each of the reorganized standing committees should be given the power of subpena and should be authorized to undertake studies of matters within its jurisdiction either by full or subcommittee action (p. 6).

Subsequently, on May 31, 1946, the then senior Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. La Follette, from the Special Committee on the Organization of Congress submitted a report, No. 1400. This also gave its first and primary attention to the number 1 problem involved in the reorganization of Congress, the reduction of the number of committees and the clear assignment of nonoverlapping jurisdiction to each committee. This report contained language showing that the work of the joint committee and the bill it prepared were the fruits of the assembled wisdom of—

> Members of Congress, political scientists, efficiency engineers, and students of government concerning the conditions that handicap Congress in the performance of its proper functions and suitable remedies.
> Since 1941 a series of independent surveys of the machinery and methods of our National Legislature have been made by public and private organizations. These surveys, including that by the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress, have reached substantially the same conclusions as to the defects in our legislative structure and operation and as to appropriate correctives. They are agreed that Congress today is neither organized nor equipped to perform adequately its main functions of determining policy, authorizing administrative organization and appropriations to carry out policy, and supervising execution of the resultant programs.
> Devised to handle the simpler tasks of an earlier day, our legislative machinery and procedures are by common consent no longer competent to cope satisfactorily with the grave and complex problems of the postwar world. They must be modernized if we are to avoid an imminent break-down of the legislative branch of the National Government.
> Cited as the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, S. 2177 is designed to reconvert our inherited and outmoded congressional machinery to the needs of today. One group of provisions deals with strengthening the policy-determining function of Congress. Because of the volume and specialized character of the legislative business, Congress has logically delegated the initial work of policy making to standing committees of its Members. These committees have had a long and useful history, some of them dating back to the early days of the Republic. There have been several major and minor reorganizations of the congressional committee system through the years, as new problems have arisen and old ones have disappeared. The system has not been revamped to meet modern needs and conditions, however, since 1921. It is now in need of a complete overhaul to enable Congress to handle efficiently the expanding problems of the postwar world.
> Today there are more than twice as many standing committees in the Senate as there are principal provinces of public policy. Responsibility for legislative action is scattered among 33 little legislatures which go their own way at their own pace and cannot act in concert. Their jurisdictions are undefined in the Senate rules, and there are many committees functioning in the same problem areas. For example, three Senate committees deal with problems of commerce and industry, five deal with public land problems, and six with the rules and administration of the Senate. Furthermore, some committees are inactive and seldom or never meet.
> To remedy this crazy-quilt pattern, S. 2177 would replace our jerry-built committee structure with a simplified system of standing committees corresponding with the major areas of public policy and administration and having authority to hold joint hearings with the parallel committees of the House of Representatives on matters of common interest. The correlation of the committee systems of the two Chambers with each other would facilitate joint action on specific measures by means of joint hearings. It would also increase the efficiency of the committee structure, facilitate closer liaison between the two Houses, and economize the time of busy legislators and administrators alike. And the coordination of the congressional committee system with the pattern of the administrative branch of the National Government would improve the performance by Congress of its legislative and supervisory functions, provide direct channels of communication and cooperation between the two branches, promote more harmonious and unified action in the development of public policies, and go a long way to bridge the gap between the legislative and executive branches of the Government (pp. 1–2).

The committee report then listed the proposed consolidation of the committees of Congress and substitution of a small number of standing committees. Following this list, the committee report states:

Moreover, the burden of committee work is especially onerous in the Senate. At present the combined membership of all the standing committees in the upper House is 481 and of the 11 major committees is 220. In addition, there are 10 special committees of the Senate, with a total membership of 87. Altogether, the 96 Senators of the Seventy-ninth Congress occupy 568 seats on its standing and special committees, an average of 6 seats per Senator. Nor are there any exclusive committees in the Senate as there are in the House, the members of which serve on no other committees. Today no Senator serves on less than 3 committees; and 1 sits on 10 committees, not counting the service on subcommittees, of which there are 67 in the Senate. In short, the committee work load of United States Senators today is too heavy to bear (p. 3).

The report went on to emphasize the fact that by establishing those standing committees and no others, jurisdictional disputes between them would be limited, if not eliminated. It stated:

S. 2177 would also define the jurisdiction of each reorganized committee so as to avoid jurisdictional disputes between them (p. 3).

The report went on to emphasize that the proposed efficient plan for a small number of standing committees would make unnecessary the rash of special investigating committees which had only helped to make the congressional machinery more cumbersome, at the same time that it interfered with, and thereby contributed inefficiency to the work of, the regular standing committees. The report said:

A third group of provisions in the bill is designed to strengthen congressional surveillance of the execution of the laws by the executive branch.

To remedy this situation, S. 2177 would authorize the standing committees of both Houses to exercise continuous surveillance of the execution of the laws by the administrative agencies within their jurisdiction. Armed with the power of subpena and staffed with qualified specialists in their respective provinces of public affairs, these committees would conduct a continuous review of the activities of the agencies administering laws, originally reported by the legislative committees.

Under this arrangement, it will no longer be necessary to create special committees of investigation from time to time. Sporadic investigations of the conduct of public affairs in the past have often served a salutary purpose by exposing administrative incompetence or corruption and by improving the execution of the laws. But they have lacked continuity and have not provided the members of standing committees with direct knowledge of the information they have gathered. In cases where legislative action is indicated, standing committees find it necessary to do much of the work over again. S. 2177 proposed, therefore, to ban the use of special committees hereafter (p. 6).

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TOBEY. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator from New Hampshire is making an admirable statement of the aims of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress. It is indeed sweet music to my ears, after the time we spent on that committee. But I think it would be unfortunate not to emphasize at this place that in formulating its plan of reorganization the Organization Committee was not unmindful of the precedents set by Congress itself in regard to the supervision of the various departments by the standing committees.

As we all know, many statutory provisions, especially in various war acts, have called for the making of reports by the executive departments handling the affairs and procedures under such acts, but not a single one of them called for a report to a special committee. They called for reports to the regular standing committees.

Therefore, on the particular point to which the Senator from New Hampshire is now adverting, perhaps this simple statement by me may augment the fine argument of the Senator from New Hampshire that Congress itself laid down the precedent for action by standing committees.

Mr. TOBEY. I thank the scholarly Senator from Utah for his contribution.

Mr. President, the report further explained that section 128 of the bill would require the standing committees of the Congress to make the necessary investigation of the activities of the executive branch of the Government, and to do so continuously. The report stated:

In effect, this section directs each standing committee of the Senate and the House to exercise continuous surveillance of the execution by the administrative agencies concerned of laws within the jurisdiction of the respective committees (p. 20).

In fact, the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 so provided in section 136 of the statute, reading as follows:

To assist the Congress in appraising the administration of the laws and in developing such amendments or related legislation as it may deem necessary, each standing committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives shall exercise continuous watchfulness of the execution by the administrative agencies concerned of any laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of such committee; and, for that purpose, shall study all pertinent reports and data submitted to the Congress by the agencies in the executive branch of the Government (pp. 23–24).

This statute has been spoken of throughout the United States as the streamlining-of-Congress statute. We are now meeting in the first session at which that streamlining will contribute efficiency. Yet, within 2 days after the new Members of the Senate were sworn in, there was submitted in the Senate a resolution providing for the continuation of the existence of a special committee whose life would otherwise expire at the end of this month. In other words, the resolutions, Senate Resolution 46 and Senate Resolution 20, proposed an exception to the streamlining enacted by Congress last year.

Within a day after Senate Resolution 46 was introduced, it was considered briefly by the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, and action in favor of this first exception to the Legislative Reorganization Act was quickly taken by a majority of the committee. On the following day the committee favorably reported the resolution to the Senate.

Thus, within less than 4 days after the new Senate had been organized under the streamlining statute which for the first time introduced efficiency and economy into the operations of the Senate, an exception had been introduced and favorably reported to the Senate, an exception which necessarily would bring back into the Congress some of the old confusion, wastefulness, and inefficiency. Thus, within less than a week after the new Senate had organized for business under the statute designed to assure efficiency in the operations and activities of Congress, we were confronted with a program squarely contrary to that which last year was proposed to the Congress by the joint committee, and to the Senate by its own committee, and which we solemnly adopted by an overwhelming vote in this Chamber.

Every evil to which the Senate report pointed in this connection will be reintroduced as a result of the adoption of such resolutions as Senate Resolution 46 or Senate Resolution 20. It means the beginning of the creation of more committees. It means the reintroduction of overlapping jurisdiction and, thus, of confusion and of jurisdictional difficulty.

Senate Resolution 46 does not even try to minimize the evil it reintroduces, the very evil against which we specifically legislated a few months ago. Senate Resolution 46 does not even say that for any subject within the jurisdiction of the special committee with which it deals, no standing committee shall have the same or duplicating jurisdiction. On the contrary, Mr. President, Senate Resolution 46 not only increases the number of committees beyond those which Congress solemnly stated were sufficient for the work of the Senate, but it results in conferring on two separate committees of the Senate jurisdiction over subjects which are exactly the same for each of the two committees.

Senate Resolution 46 constitutes an even greater defiance of the Legislative Reorganization Act than would be involved by a resolution proposing to create a new special committee for a different purpose. When the Senate debated the bill for legislative reorganization every Senator knew of the existence of the special committee known as the War Investigating Committee as well as the Small Business Committee. Every Senator knew that if it was intended that those committees should be continued as committees additional to those named in the bill, the fair and straightforward thing to do was to say so right in the bill. That was not done. That was not suggested. We thereafter legislated in full knowledge of the fact that we were not providing for a list of committees that included those special committees.

Had there been any reason to believe that those special committees were needed as additional committees, or also as ones which duplicate in part the jurisdiction of any one or many of the standing committees of the Senate, it would have been simple and frank to say so in the course of the debate and to ask that provision for that purpose be made in the statute. Even if there were any reasonable likelihood that such special committees would be needed, frankness and straightforwardness would have required a statement to that effect, not only in the course of the debate, but also in the bill itself.

I should like to refer to examples of the great body of testimony before the congressional joint committee, condemning the very type of evil which Senate Resolution 46 would reintroduce into the operations of the Senate.

The junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] said that it was archaic and grotesque to continue the conditions then prevailing in the operations of the Senate.

He referred to the confusion and overlapping in the jurisdiction of Senate committees. He said that special committees have been used to correct this condition, and then added:

> I do not think we can rely indefinitely on this creation of special committees.

He emphasized particularly the necessity of adequately staffing the standing committees, since without such staffing it becomes easier to seek the creation of special committees.

That staffing, I interpolate, was provided.

The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 addressed itself specifically to the problems of providing a substantial staff for each standing committee. The Senator from Maine told the joint committee considering this legislation of the grave dangers which will increasingly arise unless Congress adequately staffs its standing committees (hearings before joint committee, pursuant to H. Con. Res. 18, pp. 228–229).

The junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] testified before the joint committee; and among other criticisms of the existing conditions in the operations of the Senate, he specified the overlapping of committees—one of the evils against which the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 was directed, and which Senate Resolution 46 and the companion resolution submitted by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], would revive. (Hearings before joint committee, p. 165.)

My colleague the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], testified before the joint committee, particularly referring to the evil of a multiplicity of committees. I quote some of his remarks:

> My next recommendation, Mr. Chairman, would be a reduction of the committees of the House and Senate to a much lesser number than we have today, and again I do not pretend to advise the House.
> I do believe, however, that the 33 committees of the Senate could be cut down to a maximum of 12 or 14, and that could be done with more efficiency to the Senators and to the Senate, and in that way no Senator would have over 3 committees, and most of them would have only 2 (hearings of joint committee, p. 279).

At the hearings of the joint committee the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] expressed his agreement with the remarks made by the senior Senator from New Hampshire, as follows:

> If I may interrupt, I want to indicate my complete approval of what you are now saying. I know I took a hand at it at one time, and I know the chairman of the committee took a hand at it, and maybe among all of us we could work out something that would be sound in principle and might find acceptance (hearings, p. 279).

Other remarks of the senior Senator from New Hampshire were summarized by the joint committee, and I refer in particular to the summary statement of one of his recommendations, as follows:

> Abolish the use of special committees, except joint ones (hearings, p. 20).

The senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] testified before the joint committee, urging that all committee jurisdiction relating to the affairs of any department of the Government should be centralized in a single committee of the Senate—an expression of the admirable view directed against the overlapping, the confusion, the waste, and the inefficiency in the old committee system of the Senate, the reintroduction of which would be one of the consequences of the adoption of Senate Resolution 46 (hearings, pp. 19, 258–259).

There was an abundance of additional testimony on this subject before the special committee, submitted by many Members of Congress. I shall limit myself to referring to the testimony of one of the Members of the House who appeared before the joint committee, Representative WADSWORTH, of New York. He testified that some special committees had been established in the past because there were some subjects which had not yet been assigned to standing committees, and that the result was confusion. He further said that the reorganization legislation would put the power to investigate in the standing committees—and that is exactly what the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 has done.

It has also assigned all the subject matters which might be investigated to the standing committees, so that there is now no gap for which any special committee is needed.

I now turn to the record of proceedings in the Senate when the bill for legislative reorganization came before the Senate. In the course of the debates, there were numerous criticisms of the existing wasteful and inefficient committee system in the Senate. I shall mention only two instances from the debates—the criticism made by the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. Each of them specifically mentioned the evil of the duplication of authority resulting from the grant, to two committees, of the power to deal with the self-same subject. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6366, June 6, 1946.)

Two Senators raised the question with respect to the possible need at some future time of some special committee. The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] asked the then senior Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. La Follette, who was in charge of the bill in the Senate, the following question:

> Mr. DONNELL. Will the Senator be kind enough to state what his committee has in mind with respect to the following situation: Suppose an entirely unexpected subject were to arise, one which generally speaking, would not be considered as comprehended within the provinces of the committees established by the rule—as, for illustration, the matter of atomic energy or something else which came up ab initio, something we never had thought of. What is the Senator's idea, please, as to the committee to which such a subject of unexpected nature should be assigned? (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6366, June 6, 1946.)
> The point which was in my mind was whether there was adequate provision to take care of a very unexpected situation. Of course, I appreciate that the matter of atomic energy has already been covered. However, I was referring to that matter only as an illustration; it is easily possible that some other entirely unexpected situation which we cannot at this time foresee might arise within the next few years (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6366, June 6, 1946).

Similarly, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] said:

> However, I would not want section 126 to be read as meaning that we do not recognize that there may be extraordinary situations, of which the best illustration at the moment is the control of atomic energy, which are better served by special and select committees, and perhaps by joint committees (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6395, June 6, 1946.)

The then senior Senator from Wisconsin said in answer:

> I grant that point, and have conceded it in the brief time we have been able to devote to the consideration of the bill today. I have conceded the point several times, but I have also contended that when an issue or a problem of similar magnitude arises, it will not be difficult to get the respective House which may be concerned, or both Houses, to suspend the rules. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6395, June 6, 1946.)

Thereafter, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] replied:

> I think our viewpoints are in substantial agreement.

Mr. President, the Senate was intent on getting rid of special committees. Beyond peradventure, the Senate was in favor of getting rid of special committees, and we passed the bill in that form by an impressive majority. The bill went to the House of Representatives, and there that provision was stricken out. The bill came back to the Senate, and because of the pressure of time and the desire to have enacted some kind of legislation on the subject, the Senate surrendered on that point, and the provision was not in the final draft of the bill. But I now aver that it was the intent, it was the spirit, it was the purpose, of the Senate, as indicated by its own action, to do away with special committees.

The Senate passed the bill, including section 126, which sought to ban all special committees. As I have said, in the House this particular provision of the bill was dropped. The subject was explained by Representative MONRONEY, who was in charge of the bill in the House, when he was discussing the reason for the inclusion in the bill of a grant of subpena power to all standing committees. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, this was rather carefully considered by the House committee, and our set-up is considerably different from the set-up in the Senate. The Senate is plagued with a great many special committees. It is a rash that has broken out there which practically destroys the continuity and the power of the standing committees. In order to get away from that outbreak of special committees, the Senate wrote in this provision for subpena power by their standing committees. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 10073, July 25, 1946.)

So, Mr. President, the reorganization legislation contemplated that the standing committees of the Senate should themselves conduct the investigations in matters germane to the work of such committees.

Finally, the legislation included provisions which made it unnecessary to establish special committees to take over any of the jurisdiction of any standing committee, for each standing committee was provided with a staff and with subpena power.

It was explained on the floor of the Senate by the then senior Senator from Wisconsin that the provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act, with respect to the committee system in the Senate and the House, remained a matter for any future action by the Senate and the House, respectively, so far as their own committees were concerned. The Senate can change the provisions of the act with respect to the standing committees in such manner as it may deem appropriate. The act merely constitutes so far as the Senate committees are concerned, the adoption of a rule by the Senate, subject to amendment by the Senate alone.

The original section in the bill banning special committees was proposed by the joint committee of the Senate and the House, and was adopted by the Senate, as I have heretofore said. By that action the Senate indicated its view on the subject of special committees. The Senate obviously had no need for insisting that the House should express a similar view with respect to its own committee situation. Since, as Representative MONRONEY stated on the floor of the House, the situation in the House was different, and since the Legislative Reorganization Act would fail of passage if the Senate insisted that the House should adopt a particular viewpoint with respect to its own committee situation, the Senate in the closing days of the session was agreeable to the passage of the bill without the section banning special committees for the two Houses.

However, the Senate had expressed its view, and this conformed to the view of every witness who had appeared before the joint committee on the subject of this legislation, and who had spoken on this point, including members of the Senate. The same view was expressed on the floor of the Senate.

Whether a specific ban against special committees be included in any legislative reorganization act or not, it will, of course, be in the power of the Senate or the House to take action for the creation of a special committee. But, as indicated by the questions put in the course of the debate by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] and the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the only time when this could conceivably be appropriate would be when "an entirely unexpected subject were to arise, one not comprehended within the provinces" of the standing committees—some "very unexpected situation which we cannot at this time foresee"—some extraordinary situations for which it might be necessary to establish a special joint committee of the Senate and the House.

Can it be said that any subject matter which the special committee provided for in Senate Resolution 46 wants to investigate was not foreseen or foreseeable? Can it be said that the possible need for the continuation of this special committee is a wholly unexpected matter which no one could have anticipated? The only thing which was not foreseeable was that an attempt would be made, at the very moment the reform legislation became effective, to undermine and begin the process of wrecking that legislation. The only thing that could not have been foreseen was that even before the legislation became effective, in the maneuvering for power in the Eightieth Congress that had not yet been begun, plans would be laid to whittle this reform statute down, to cut its scope, and to set effective precedents for its ultimate destruction.

I now come to another aspect of this problem, one that was mentioned by the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] when Senate Resolution 46 was under discussion in the Senate on January 10, 1947. He referred to the fact that a salary increase was granted to Members of the Senate as part and parcel of the legislation which complied with the widespread popular demand for the intruduction of efficiency in the operations of the Senate. The increase in financial emoluments for Members of the Senate, provided in this streamlining legislation, is even greater than one would gather from the remarks of the senior Senator from Maryland. He referred to the subject only very briefly and, of course, did not mean to indicate that the Members of the Senate received only a $5,000 increase in salary. They received a great deal more than this. In the first place, $2,500 of the $5,000 is free from income tax. In the second place, highly valuable monetary remuneration, over and above the salary, was provided for in section 602 of this streamlining statute, which is the provision with respect to retirement pay for Members of Congress.

No matter how justified these provisions may be, it is only fair that we should face frankly the fact that these several provisions constitute a very large increase in the emoluments of Members of Congress.

No matter how justified it is to remunerate public officials who are going to do a much more efficient and competent job by reason of the streamlining provisions of the legislation, it is essential that we bear in mind what the senior Senator from Maryland so cogently and properly mentioned on the floor of the Senate last Friday. The streamlining, the elimination of waste and confusion, the introduction of efficiency, were put in the same bill with the increase in emoluments. It was entirely feasible to have separate legislation to deal with these subjects if it was not intended to recognize that they have a relation to each other.

But, as the Senator from Maryland indicated, it is now proposed, before Congress has had an opportunity to get underway at this session, and before we have had the opportunity to give effect to the streamlining provisions of this efficiency legislation, that we shall retrace our steps, throw overboard some of the efficiencies, and reintroduce some of the very confusion and waste which we obligated ourselves to eliminate. At the same time, however, no proposal is made to reduce to any extent whatever the increased emoluments granted to Members of the Senate in the streamlining, efficiency statute.

I am persuaded, Mr. President, that all Members of the Senate are sincere and honorable in dealing with the subject now under discussion. Yet, all of us are living in the light of intense publicity and we must make sure that not only shall our action conform to high standards, but that we shall give no reasonable person an opportunity to think or say the contrary. It has been said already that it would be fraud for Congress, while retaining the emoluments provided in the bill, to throw overboard some of the efficiency which made the reorganization law acceptable to the American public.

I do not think that the charge of fraud is justified in the sense that a charge would impute to any Member of the Senate an intention to obtain money under false pretences. But the consequence of the adoption of Senate Resolution 46 in its effect on the efficiency of Congress and on that which the public thought it was getting through the reorganization law, would be just as bad as if there had been fraud. In brief, the ill effect on the public interest and on the operations of Congress itself would be the equivalent of the ill effect which would have flowed from actual fraud.

More than three-fourths of the men now in the Senate were Members of the Senate when committees were created to study the necessary streamlining of Congress, when such committees reported on the evils which had to be eliminated, and when legislation was enacted for the purpose of eliminating those evils—evils for whose reintroduction into the operations of Congress Senate Resolution 46 seeks to have the dubious honor of being the first harbinger.

It is well known that men do not enter the Senate simply for the monetary remuneration. They are impelled by a sense of service. It is also true that references were made to the fact, in the committee's report on the legislative-reorganization program, that power comes to Members of the Senate through the position of chairman of a committee, and that this is a highly valued perquisite even if considered solely in terms of the opportunity to perform service. It gives the chairman a staff and a forum and much else that is highly gratifying to a man whether his primary purpose be public service or any other consideration.

In the reports on the reorganization legislation, mention is made of the fact that the legislation, by reducing the number of chairmanships, would deprive some of the Members of Congress of such desirable positions. Nevertheless, the interests of efficiency and economy were plaeed high above those of personal satisfaction or aggrandizement.

Now, Senate Resolution 46 would embarrass the Senate by a reversal of this salutary trend. Again chairmanships would be created, additional to those provided for under the Legislative Reorganization Act. Again additional committee staffs would be authorized, additional to those provided for under the standing committees listed in the Legislative Reorganization Act. Again more forums for chairmen and other members would be provided additional to those set up under the efficiency and streamlining provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act.

Once we start on this reverse trend we not only promote confusion, waste, and inefficiency, but we also provide occasions for logrolling and backscratching, and deals, in which great prizes of new committee chairmanships and the authorization of new staffs and great power are involved. It is not necessary to say or to assume or to think that that is the motive behind Senate Resolution 46. It is sufficient to recognize that the adoption of the resolution would set us upon a dire course in which the opportunity for men, if so motivated, would be greatly increased.

This leads me to the discussion of a much graver danger in the adoption of the pending resolutions for a continuation or creation of special committees. There is a serious danger that the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 can be converted from an instrument of clean government to an instrument of machine politics. It is not necessary, at this precise moment and on this particular day in the history of the Eightieth Congress, to consider in a discussion of the pending resolutions whether in fact they have a present relation to the problem of machine politics. If the need for a consideration of that question should arise, I shall be glad to consider the advisability of exploring the present situation thoroughly. This is not, at the present moment, necessary because, regardless of the presence or absence of any machine politics at this particular moment, the adoption of the practice of creating special committees will set in process a method and a technique which I predict will readily be used in the interests of machine politics, sooner or later.

When I speak of machine politics, I am referring to the creation of a machine for the domination of the Senate by either a single person or a small oligarchy. It is one thing for such men to control the rank and file of the majority party—Republican or Democratic—whichever may happen to have the majority voice in the Senate. It is quite another thing for the leaders of the Senate to be the servants of the rank and file of the Senators of their respective parties.

The phenomenon of machine control of a legislative chamber is not impossible in our system. On the contrary, we have had some well-known instances, fortunately not continuous, in the lifetime of our own generation. People have not yet forgotten the fact that the House was controlled by a very small oligarchy, and to some extent by one man, in the first decade of this century. People have not yet forgotten that following the First World War there was something of the sort in the Senate.

At the present time the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 has enhanced the value, to any individual or a small group desirous of getting a machine grip on the Senate, of creating special committees for the furtherance of their political machine purposes. One of the very virtues of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 is that it has reduced the number of committees in the Senate, and thus has reduced the number of committee chairmanships in the Senate, the number of committees on which an individual Senator can sit, the number of committees in which a chairman and his committee members can share the control of the staff, and the number of forums which each Senator can have for his public and publicized participation in affairs. Last year there were 54 committees in the Senate. Under the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, there are to be only 15 committees in the Senate.

This very change makes all the greater the boon which can be conferred on an individual Senator by letting him have a special committee and its chairmanship, or by getting on a special committee. These posts, being now in short supply for the persons who may desire such opportunity, are therefore more valuable in their eyes.

Take it from the point of view not only of the man who wants to be a chairman but of the individual Senator. Last year the average number of committee memberships of each Senator was six. This year, under the reform statute, each Senator, with a very few exceptions, is limited to two committee memberships. The creation of a special committee, and the appointment of a Senator even to an ordinary membership on such a committee, at once increases his committee memberships, his participation in the control and use of committee staff, and the forum for his public activities, by 50 percent.

Up to the time of the enactment of this reform statute, the creation of a special committee, the post of chairman of a special committee, and the ordinary membership on a special committee, were all relatively easier to obtain. Now that they have become scarce commodities, any person who can form a small oligarchy for capturing the control of the Senate has a great weapon at its command. So far as committee chairmanships and memberships are concerned, it is to a large extent the only weapon in the hands of such a small oligarchy. They cannot have anywhere the same power with respect to the chairmanship and membership of the standing committees that they can have with respect to a special committee. They can arrange not only to create a special committee, but they can also kill it. They can even revive a special committee, but as a new committee, for the purpose of transferring the chairmanship or other memberships of such a special committee from one person to another. In short, the opportunity to create special committees becomes an opportunity of dispensing political patronage of great value. The very fact that a special committee can be discontinued enables the dispensers of patronage to hold a club over the chairman and members of a special committee. In short, the resort to the creation of special committees, except in some highly extraordinary situation, means the resort to a spoils system for the control, through a machine, of the operations of the Senate.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TOBEY. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. In connection with the extremely able address being made by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, I should like to remind him that he and I served together as members of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and I should like to ask him if it is not a fact that the clerical assistants of the special committees far exceeded in number those of the regular committees, and that hundreds of thousands of dollars were appropriated for clerical hire for special committees? Furthermore, the special committees borrowed clerical help from the various departments of the Government, to the extent of additional hundreds of thousands of dollars. Today, the number of clerks serving the special committees is three times as great as the number of clerks allowed to regular committees by the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

Mr. TOBEY. And may I add to the comment of the Senator from South Carolina that, with respect to the special committees which are now seeking to be revived, or extended, whichever term may be appropriate, one of the committees, with many clerks, sprawls over 13 rooms in the Senate Office Building, while some of us need a fourth room to carry on legislative business. There is food for thought in the comment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, the spoils system should never be used on the Members of the Senate themselves. They are freely elected representatives of the people. They are here to act in accordance with the dictates of their consciences. I am sure that every Member of the Senate has that in his mind and heart. There is danger in enabling any person, or any small oligarchy, to bring pressure on any Member of the Senate in any future year, to fall in with the program or the purposes of a ruling machine.

We are all human and have the frailties of the human race. One of our frailties is that the nature and impact of proposals may not at times be too clear. Frequently the line between principle and expediency is not clearly marked. Thus, in many matters relating to legislation and the conduct of the legislative body there is a lack of clarity between that which is required by conscience and that which is insinuated by expediency. It is in those areas that the power of a machine to dispense patronage will tend to carry the day for the purposes of the machine.

We had better stick to clean politics, to reform legislation, to the efficiencies and economies introduced by the Legislative Reorganization Act. Instead, however, we find ourselves already in the undesirable position of being asked to create a dangerous precedent which may be useful, at one time or another, to any person or persons seeking to control the Senate through a machine operation. Under the law the present Senate was going to have 15 committee chairmanships. As things stand no boss or bosses, in the years ahead, would be likely to have in any ruling oligarchy which they might seek to set up, the cooperation of more than five or six of the chairmen of the standing committees, if indeed they could get that many; but if they can create two special committees they at once increase their group of powerful followers by one-third or more.

Here at the outset of our work in the present Congress we are being asked to create or extend two special committees. Obviously, the plans for those two special committees were made before this Congress was even organized, before most of the Senators had yet come to Washington. If this can be done before the Reorganization Act has taken effect, or at the very moment it takes effect, the process can be repeated in every Congress; indeed it can be repeated in the Eightieth Congress, so that additional special committees may be created as the purposes of any group seeking control may require.

Those who planned this unexpected and regrettable blow at the Reorganization Act did not even deem it necessary to permit the thorough consideration which the gravity of their proposal requires. Here is a proposal which runs directly counter to the purpose, the methods, and the whole basis and structure of the Legislative Reorganization Act. Such a proposal calls for hearings at which witnesses might testify and present for the consideration of the members of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration the vital facts and principles which are involved. We all know that in hearings before the Joint Committee of Congress dealing with the Reorganization Act there were numerous witnesses from Congress, from the executive departments of the Government, from learned groups, from all manner of experts. Not a single one of them, not a single Member of the Senate or the House, was given the slightest opportunity to appear before the Senate committee considering these two extraordinary resolutions for the continuance and maintenance of special committees in the very face and in disregard of the new reform statute.

In order to achieve this reform it became necessary for the press, the radio, and the people of the United States to carry on a campaign for years. It became necessary for Congress to expend money for prolonged hearings. It became necessary for members of the joint committee to spend hours, days, and months of work. That was only a part of the cost and a part of the prerequisite and condition to being able to achieve sound legislation on this subject.

But when it comes to breaking down the reorganization legislation, no safeguards are provided, no inquiry of any substantial nature into the merits or demerits of the proposal is permitted in any committee hearing. It always takes a long time to create a good and fine structure. It can be destroyed in a moment. But that kind of atomic bomb is something from which the people and the Senate should be protected. Such protection could have been given to them by the few men who devised this scheme. Sound restraint would have led them to reject it. The protection could have been provided in the standing committee to which the Senate referred the two resolutions relating to the two special committees. Instead, those resolutions were rushed through the committee, not in the open, not where the public could see what was going on, and not with any opportunity for the public to be heard.

I do not mean to suggest that any impropriety was intended by any Member of Congress in the proceedings in the Committee on Rules and Administration. It could be that the nature of these two resolutions and their consequences were not fully comprehended or understood at the time the Committee on Rules and Administration met last Thursday. But that is one of the points I am making; that steps on the road to the cemetery where the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 and its reforms are likely to be buried have been proposed without the realization that one of the probable consequences will be the burial of a portion of this reform measure at the very moment when it has first become alive, and the interment of further portions of it as time runs on.

Mr. President, the eyes of the people are on Congress. The eyes of the people are on a Congress which is now in the majority control of the Republicans. The eyes of the people are on a Congress which has, for the first time in decades, an opportunity to function with real efficiency. At such a moment it is not wise for the Republican Party, or for the Senate as a whole, to start the process of bringing back any unfortunate conditions, and in particular, unfortunate conditions already legislated out of existence.

In this beginning fortnight of the new, streamlined and Republican Congress, let us justify fully the expectations of the people, which we ourselves phrased for them, when we adopted for the operation of Congress the efficiencies and economies of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION RELATING TO TERM OF MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. HATCH obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HATCH. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. Perhaps I ought to say that I desire at this time to make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. There are on the Executive Calendar a number of nominations of high national interest. I felt that we could dispose of the Executive Calendar promptly, and act on these nominations at this time. I will say furthermore to the Senator from New Mexico that if we dispose speedily of the Executive Calendar I shall move the resumption of legislative session.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Maine that it was not my intention to occupy the floor for any length of time, not for more than 5 minutes at the most. I wanted to discuss a joint resolution which I introduced earlier today. I did not ask unanimous consent to make explanation of it at the time I introduced it during the morning hour because I consider that to be bad practice.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I can listen to the Senator from New Mexico for 5 minutes with pleasure, and with profit to myself.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator from Maine. I promise not to delay him long.

Mr. President, many months ago I made the statement publicly, and in several different places, that at the outset of this session of Congress I intended to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which would give a 4-year term to Members of the House of Representatives, instead of the present term of 2 years. In keeping with my previously announced intention I have introduced that joint resolution today.

My reason for the proposal is not based upon a desire merely to lengthen the terms of Members of the House for their own benefit or gain. The amendment is offered for the purpose of curing what I believe to be a serious defect in the governmental structure, a defect which has cost the Nation much in times past.

Under the provisions of my proposed constitutional amendment Members of the House of Representatives would be elected for terms running concurrently with that of the President. Then if a change in the Government should take place, the change could be reflected in both branches, executive and legislative.

At the time I made the original suggestion, the Democratic Party, my party, was in the majority in both branches, the legislative and the executive. No divided responsibility then existed, and there was no party division.

When the returns of the last election were received and I realized that the people had chosen a Republican House and Senate, thereby creating the very divided responsibility against which the amendment is aimed, I realized that proposing the amendment now might be considered as a party matter, as a rebellious attitude against the election result, or perhaps as "sour grapes." Hence my brief explanation that my intention was announced long ago, before anyone—even the most optimistic Republican—contemplated that both the Senate and the House would become Republican.

Mr. President, as I have said, the change from Democratic to Republican control of Congress has nothing to do with this proposal. My views are based upon the history of the country. The history of American politics as it concerns midterm elections is one of absorbing interest. Past administrations under such circumstances have conclusively proved that any good that may result from midterm elections of Members of the House is more than offset by the evils which in the past have always resulted when divided party responsibility between executive and legislative branches of government existed.

At some time in the future I hope to address the Senate on the history of midterm elections, but such is not my intention today. I realize full well that in the light of the election results of last November and the present Republican Party control of the legislative branch of government, now is not an opportune time to urge the adoption of the amendment which I propose. As a matter of fact, I myself choose to postpone action. I want sufficient time to elapse so that both branches of government, the legislative and the executive, can demonstrate whether political antagonism, which has always developed in the past under similar circumstances, will again occur. If such antagonism does not arise, if fine, fair attitudes are taken, such as that evidenced by the able address of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], it will probably mean that the amendment which I propose will not be seriously considered. Under such circumstances probably it should not be considered.

In the critical years in which we live, the most important thing for all officials in both branches of government is to devote all our energies and abilities to making democratic institutions effective. It is no time for political bickering and quarreling for the sake of party advantage. But if history does repeat itself, if sharp and bitter political antagonisms arise and stymie the Government and the country, that condition will operate to create strong support for the amendment which I propose, and in that event I shall urge its adoption. But today I have merely introduced the joint resolution and requested that it be referred to the appropriate committee, which has been done.

PROPOSED CONTINUATION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEES

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, inasmuch as my committee was brought into the discussion by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], and comment was made with respect to the promptness with which Senate Resolution 20 and Senate Resolution 46 were reported to the Senate, I take my full share of responsibility.

I wish to point out very definitely that one of the most difficult and heart-searching votes of my life was when I had to vote to send this country into war. I knew what would happen when war should ensue. I knew that thousands of men would be killed and thousands more would be wounded. I knew that great industries would have to be controlled; that it would be necessary to impose restrictions and restraints upon the American people; that an oligarchy such as that to which reference has been made would operate behind the curtain of secrecy. During the entire war I served on the War Department subcommittee, as well as the Navy Department subcommittee, of the Committee on Appropriations. At the beginning, when the appropriations were small we could obtain rather adequate information; but when requests for billions of dollars were made that was impossible. No Senator could ask an intelligent question about a request for a billion dollars when the request was presented quickly by the armed services. We had to take their word.

I contend that we shall probably find, as we did after the previous war, that some men enriched themselves; that some men were corrupt in their dealings; that many defective munitions were supplied to the young men who by our vote and our action were sent abroad to face death in the front lines.

The Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program is not new. If it were, there would have been long hearings before my committee, if my suggestion were followed. This is merely the continuation of a committee which I was glad to see formed, and which I have supported in every respect. The resolution provides for the continuation of the committee so that it may function in the same fine manner in which it has carried on in the past.

The same statement applies to the Small Business Committee. If it had not been for the Small Business Committee, acting as a forum in the Congress, in my judgment thousands of small businesses would have been trampled into the ground during the past few years. It was only in the forum of the Small Business Committee that small businessmen had an opportunity to present their cause against restrictions and against the consolidations of large industries which were necessary as a result of the war.

I contend that both committees should be continued. They are not new. There is nothing surprising about them; and their continuation would be in no way an attack upon the reorganization of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I do not wish to deal at length with the problems involved in the resolution to continue the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program, but I should like to deal with the suggestion that in some way there is bad faith or a violation of the spirit of the La Follette-Monroney Act in regard to special committees. How can the spirit of the act possibly prohibit the creation or continuation of special committees when we took out of the bill the prohibition of special committees? How can we violate the spirit of an act when we do not violate its terms? Not only do we not violate its terms, but the proposal to prohibit special committees was taken out of the bill when it was passed.

The bill as passed by the Senate contained this provision in section 126:

> No bill or resolution, and no amendment to any bill or resolution, to establish or to continue a special or select committee, including a joint committee, shall be received or considered in either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

That proposal went to the House. The House, after debate, deleted it. They thought it was much too rigid. I think it was much too rigid. Whether I voted for the bill or not, there were many good things in it; but under that provision the very committee which framed the La Follette-Monroney Act could never have been created. It was a special joint committee. We had already created the Atomic Energy Committee, and we had the Joint Committee on the Economic Report. All such committees would have been prohibited by the sweeping provisions of this particular bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. I am sure that the Senator has in mind that the motion to concur in the House amendments, one of them being to strike out section 126 of the Senate bill, was made by former Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin, himself.

Mr. TAFT. Yes. There were many things in the original La Follette-Monroney bill which were not retained in that bill by the Senate. When the House called attention to this particular provision, which would have been very difficult to handle, we concurred in the amendment of the House on the motion of Senator La Follette and struck the provision from the bill.

How can we have any spirit left after we have removed the actual provision? Moreover, the very fact that it was in the bill and was taken out by Congress is a final answer to the statement that there is any spirit left. It is conclusive evidence that the Congress did not propose to prohibit special committees. So how can we possibly be charged with bad faith in connection with the salary provision or any other provision in the act because we are not following some provision proposed by the Committee on Organization which provision was eliminated from the bill? It may be that one can point to inconsistencies of particular Senators who favored the original provision, but certainly there can be no charge that Congress is morally or in any other way bound to conform to the spirit of an act when the spirit was expressly taken out of the act by action of the Congress.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think I can show the Senate how the spirit of the Reorganization Act has been violated in this instance. Under the rules of the Senate as they now exist, the creation of a special committee requires the submission of a resolution and the reference of the resolution to the committee of the Senate having jurisdiction of the subject matter. That was the way the Truman committee was originally created. A resolution to investigate expenditures in connection with national defense was introduced and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and from that committee was reported a resolution which resulted in the creation of the Truman committee. Then the resolution was referred to the Senate Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to provide money from time to time. In this instance, when the Brewster resolution and the Wherry resolution were submitted they should have been referred to the proper standing committees having jurisdiction over the subject matters. Instead, by unanimous consent the Wherry resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and the Brewster resolution also bypassed the proper committee and went to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and that committee has reported both resolutions. If the Committee on Armed Services had had an opportunity to look over the Brewster resolution, and the Committee on Banking and Currency had had an opportunity to look over the Wherry resolution, and had reported them to the Senate, that would have been in keeping with the letter and the spirit of the La Follette-Monroney Act.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator is talking about another point which has nothing to do with the La Follette-Monroney Act. All this argument is based on the assertion that we are violating the spirit of the La Follette-Monroney Act. If the Senator wants to say that we are violating the rules of the Senate, that is another question; and I am willing, when the resolution comes up, to postpone it so that the situation may be straightened out in that respect. I am concerned only with the assertion going out to the country that in some way, acting in bad faith after taking advantage of the benefits of the act, we are refusing to carry out the provisions of the La Follette-Monroney Act. We are not. In the La Follette-Monroney Act the Congress expressly refused to abolish special committees. It becomes a question of policy on which Senators may differ. I quite agree that there is a very good argument against special committees. I think there is a very good argument for many special committees. I believe that we should not extend the principle too far. I think the provision which was stricken from the bill went too far. I would favor a rule to send all such resolutions to the Rules and Administration Committee. I think that would provide more effective control. What has happened before is that the standing committee having jurisdiction has approved the resolution and sent it to the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has felt that the matter of policy was settled and that the only question was that of money. We have divided the responsibility between the two committees, and consequently it has been pretty easy to have special committees established. I think it would be a better rule if we were to send all such proposals to the Committee on Rules and Administration and then require the approval and consent of the standing committee having jurisdiction before the matter is reported. I think there ought to be an over-all control by the Committee on Rules and Administration. I understand, in connection with this particular matter, that the question has been put up to the Committee on Armed Services and that what is finally presented will be completely satisfactory both to the standing committee and to the Committee on Rules and Administration. However, that question is not before us today.

Mr. HAYDEN. It should have gone to the Committee on Armed Services in the first place.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know the Senator desires to be accurate. There was no agreement in the Committee on Armed Services to any proposal at all. There was a discussion, and an effort was made to reach a meeting of minds; but both Democratic and Republican Senators on the committee reserved the right to oppose anything that was presented that would violate the standing committee rule.

Mr. TAFT. I trust that before the resolution comes before us there will be complete agreement. I think that any standing committee has a right to object to the creation of a special committee which will take jurisdiction from the standing committee. I was really concerned today only with pointing out what actually had happened, to show that there certainly is no spirit of the La Follette-Monroney Act floating around in the air. The act is before us. I think in the next 2 or 3 months we may find that a number of amendments ought to be made, but I do not think that any change ought to be made until complete consideration is given.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is correct in stating that when the bill passed the Senate it carried a provision against the creation of any special or joint committee. The bill then went to the House, where that provision was eliminated. It came back to the Senate when we were on the verge of adjournment, and we almost had to accept the House amendment or get no legislation at all along that line. Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin, was operating almost at the point of a gun, in the sense that the bill had to be handled in the best way possible, and he yielded in regard to that and other House amendments in order that we might get some legislation. I do not believe that anyone has contended that the pending resolutions violate the La Follette-Monroney Act, but they violate the spirit in which the Senate acted when it considered the question originally and placed in the bill a prohibition against the creation of special committees.

Mr. TAFT. On the question as to the spirit, so far as the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program is concerned, I should like to read what Senator La Follette stated during the debate. He said this:

> It is my understanding of the language as it now stands that existing committees which may be continued beyond the end of this Congress would be permitted, if they were given additional funds and authority, to conclude their work; but the creation of such committees in the future is banned by the measure as it stands.

So, Mr. President, even if there were a spirit represented by the personal views of the distinguished Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin, apparently he felt that if the committee's work were not concluded—and, after all, the work of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program is all one job; the committee has been doing it, and has not finished it—certainly its continuation would not violate even the spirit as set forth by Senator La Follette, so far as that particular committee is concerned.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to make an observation or two on this question, in view of what the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] has just said. Under the rules with respect to the former Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, it was necessary for every committee requesting money to give to that committee a budget regarding the amount of money it needed for the year, along with an explanation of how the money was to be used. Last April the then Senator from New York, Mr. Mead, was chairman of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. At that time it was difficult for his committee to work out an agenda so as to get a sufficient amount of money to continue its work through 1946. It was difficult to justify its continued existence. The then Senator from New York told the Senator from Illinois, in the presence of other members of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, that when 1946 was over his committee would be through. They would fold insofar as further investigations were concerned.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that this resolution does violate the spirit of the La Follette-Monroney Act. In order to ascertain whether anyone was interested in curtailing and finally abolishing special committees, all one has to do is read the debate which occurred last year on the floor of the Senate. The RECORD is full of it, Mr. President. Even Senator La Follette satisfied the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate, after a colloquy upon the matter, that special committees should go.

I respectfully submit that under the Constitution of the United States we in the Senate of the United States have the right to make our own rules. The La Follette committee recognized that when it made the report, for it proposed that certain sections of title I be enacted by the Congress:

(b) With full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules (so far as relating to the procedure in such House) at any time, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

In other words, we do not have to follow the Reorganization Act at all. The House makes its rules, and the Senate makes its rules. So far as the matter of following any part of the La Follette-Monroney Act is concerned, we in the Senate would not be compelled to do so under the Constitution of the United States. But when we review the debates on that subject which were held in this body, no one can gainsay that the Senate did not abolish special committees. I do not refer to what was said on the last day of the session, when practically every Member of the Senate had his bags packed, ready to go home. There was no time for debate or even a conference. Senator La Follette accepted the House version in order to get something. But I refer to what was said when this matter was debated at length. There we find statements and conclusions which will prove to every reasonable and prudent mind that the spirit of the Senate of the United States on special committees, as expressed at that time, certainly is being violated by these particular resolutions.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I announce that if that motion is agreed to, upon the conclusion of the call of the Executive Calendar and the disposition of the matters on the calendar, I shall move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

NOMINATION OF DILLARD B. LASSETER—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, on January 8 the nomination of Dillard B. Lasseter, of Georgia, to be Administrator of the Farmers' Home Administration, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I point out that the reference should be changed from Banking and Currency to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency be discharged from the further consideration of the nomination, and that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

If there be no executive reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the calendar.

UNITED NATIONS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Warren R. Austin, of Vermont, to be the representative of the United States of America to the United Nations with the rank and status of Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, and the representative of the United States of America in the Security Council of the United Nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Mark Foster Ethridge, of Kentucky, to be the United States representative on the Commission of Investigation established by the Security Council of the United Nations on December 19, 1946, to ascertain the facts relating to alleged border violations along the frontier between Greece on the one hand and Albania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia on the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of O. Max Gardner, of North Carolina, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Great Britain.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, about a year ago I rose on the floor of the Senate and said that I intended to protest the confirmation of any further nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service unless the State of North Dakota was represented in that Service. Today we have before us 81 nominations. Eleven are the nominations of persons from the State of New York, and five are nominations of persons from the State of Missouri. I simply wish to register my protest against having the Senate confirm any of the nominations which are before it today, and I serve notice that until the State of North Dakota is represented at least once in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service, after being a member of this Union for 57 years, I shall continue to protest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of O. Max Gardner, of North Carolina, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Great Britain.

The nomination was confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the other nominations on the calendar.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of S. Pinkney Tuck, of New York, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Egypt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of George Wadsworth, of New York, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Iraq.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Lowell C. Pinkerton, of Missouri, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Republic of Lebanon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of J. Rives Childs, of Virginia, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Saudi Arabia, to serve concurrently and without additional compensation as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Kingdom of Yemen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, insofar as the nominations which have just been confirmed are concerned, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified forthwith of the confirmations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, inasmuch as the remainder of the nominations are for routine promotions in the career service, I ask unanimous consent that they be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. I now move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agree to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

PROPOSED CONTINUATION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEES — INVESTIGATION OF COURTS-MARTIAL SYSTEMS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I know of no other matter——

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so as to permit me to make a brief comment on a measure?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a few days ago I submitted, on behalf of myself and the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], a resolution, which has been numbered Senate Resolution 34, calling for the appointment of a special committee, to be composed of four Senators from the Committee on Armed Services and three Senators from the Committee on the Judiciary, to conduct an investigation into the courts-martial systems of the Army and the Navy. Upon giving that matter further thought, I wish to say, Mr. President, that I think it is so important that we in the Eightieth Congress do not proceed to create new special committees that I should like to make a brief comment upon a substitute resolution, which I now ask unanimous consent to submit and to have substituted for Senate Resolution 34.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be received and will be substituted as requested, and will be appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 56) submitted by Mr. MORSE (for himself and Mr. YOUNG) was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, as follows:

Resolved, That a subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services be appointed by the Chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, and be authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of the operation of the courts-martial systems of the Army and Navy, and of the prisons, jails, and places of incarceration of Army and Navy prisoners with particular emphasis on (1) alleged miscarriages of justice arising out of the operation of such systems and places of incarceration; (2) the question of whether or not punishments meted under such systems are unduly excessive; (3) the alleged lack of uniformity in punishments meted under such systems; (4) the question of whether or not present methods of holding courts-martial are desirable and proper; and (5) any desirable improvements in or modifications of courts-martial systems and places of incarceration or the administration thereof. The subcommittee shall report to the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services at the earliest practicable date the results of its study and investigation, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

For the purposes of this resolution the subcommittee is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate in the Eightieth Congress, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the subcommittee, which shall not exceed $15,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in reply to arguments which have been made on the floor of the Senate today in favor of continuing certain special committees, I wish to say that in my opinion we are not confronted with a question of good faith, as to whether or not we are keeping faith with the spirit of the Reorganization Act. I am not concerned about that question because it is irrelevant to the real issue before us. It seems to me that we should be concerned with the issue of how best to carry on efficient operation of the business of the Senate of the United States. I certainly am willing to meet, in discussion and argument on that issue, those who desire to sustain the major premise that throughout the sessions of the Eightieth Congress, and of Congresses which will meet in the future, we can maintain maximum parliamentary efficiency in this body if we return to the system of multiple special committees, such as has characterized the Senate of the United States for years past.

We saw the abuses of that practice in the last session of the Congress. Time and time again we saw standing committees of the Senate unable to get a quorum because most of the members of standing committees found many of their busy days taken up with attending meetings of special committees.

I think the country has a right to have us strike out boldly now, at the beginning of the Eightieth Congress, for an efficient Senate. I certainly look askance on what I deem to be a beginning movement to return us to a repetition of the errors of the past by continuing and creating many special committees. I think the procedure of having special committees should be so drastically hemmed in with restrictions and safeguards that only in cases of exceptional circumstances will it be possible to secure such a grant of special committee authority from the Senate. I think we should stop playing politics with special committees and give the people of the country an efficient and business-like parliamentary procedure, working through recognized standing committees and their subcommittees.

This practice of trying to satisfy pressure groups by appointing special committees should stop in the interest of good and efficient government. I note that today another resolution has been introduced calling for the appointment of another special committee. The other day I proposed a special committee to investigate courts martial, but in keeping with the spirit of the argument I now make, Mr. President, I offer a substitute resolution for Senate Resolution 34, because I think the time has come to stop the presentation of resolutions for the appointment of special committees.

As far as my proposed courts-martial investigation is concerned, I agree that the Committee on the Judiciary should also have an interest in the investigation of the courts-martial systems of the Army and the Navy. So far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to have the whole job assigned to either the Committee on the Judiciary or to the Armed Services Committee, but I do not think we need a special committee to do the job as I first proposed. Hence I am opposed to setting up a special committee to do that job, and therefore I offer my new resolution for the work to be done under one of the standing committees. Now, as to this issue of continuing special committees which were appointed by other Congresses, it may be that some committees now in existence should be allowed some time to complete their work, but I doubt if they should be allowed to start new investigations. I think the matter probably should be resolved by a reasonable compromise. However, I would suggest to those in the Senate who are so anxious to continue these special committees for one purpose or another that any compromise must include the termination date of such committees. I say that because I have a feeling that the votes are not here to continue all the special committees which certain groups in the Senate desire to continue for as long and for whatever purpose those groups have in mind. I shall be glad to consider any compromise proposed, but if I go along with a compromise then it must be so phrased that we will know definitely that the special committee is going out of existence at the termination of the investigation set for a certain date. Further, I want to know how much money the committee is going to be allowed to spend in the months ahead, and what its personnel is going to be. I understand there are some special committees with personnel staffs of 30 or more. I am in favor of economizing in the costs of government wherever we can without interfering with the efficient operation of the Government and without depriving the people of this country the service to which they are entitled. However, I think many of these special committees are wasteful of the taxpayers' dollars and duplicate the work of standing committees.

Hence I am not going along with continuing special committees just because some in my party want to make political capital out of investigations. I am not interested in a partisan approach to the problems of national welfare which confront us. I think we should bring to a close the work of these special committees very quickly.

I do not know what my view will be on the resolutions presented, to continue certain special committees for at least a time, but I do say that the burden of proof is clearly on those who desire to extend committees. I think the obligation rests on the Members of the Eightieth Congress to see to it that we do not go back to the errors of the past, and indulge again in the inefficient operation of the Senate that characterized it when there were in existence the many complex, duplicating, and multiple special committees of the Senate. If I were to list the reasons why I think special committees should be discontinued I would mention the following:

First. The jurisdiction of the standing committees has been so comprehensively described in the reformed rules as to cover every conceivable subject of legislation. Thus, to create a special committee is to trespass upon the assigned jurisdiction of some standing committee.

Second. The standing committees of the Senate have been authorized by the Legislative Reorganization Act to exercise continuous oversight of the execution of the laws by the administrative agencies within their respective jurisdictions. They are being equipped with professional staffs and expert investigators to assist them in performing their oversight function and have been armed with the subpena power for this purpose. Hereafter the investigatory function of Congress should be performed by its standing committees which have been empowered and equipped for the purpose instead of relying upon special investigating committees which are sporadic in nature and cannot introduce legislation to give effect to their recommendations.

Third. The reformed Senate rules limit Senators to service on two standing committees each so that they can meet their legislative responsibilities more effectively. If, in addition, Senators are appointed to serve on special committees, the burdens of committee work will be correspondingly multiplied and the old evils of poor attendance and scattered attention will return.

Fourth. Creation of one or two special committees now will pave the way for the establishment of a rash of special committees with inevitable duplication of the work of the standing committees and unnecessary large-scale expenditures. It might also lead to a revival of the use of staff personnel borrowed from downtown departments with all the disadvantages of that practice.

Fifth. Creation of special committees to deal with subjects already assigned to standing committees will also be a burden to, and impair the efficiency of, the executive agencies of the government by requiring their officials to repeat their testimony on the same subjects before several committees of the Senate.

Sixth. Sporadic inquiries by select committees lack continuity and fail to provide the members of standing committees with direct knowledge of the information gathered. In cases where legislative action is indicated, standing committees find it necessary to do much of the work over again.

Seventh. Special investigations should be conducted by subcommittees of the reorganized standing committees having jurisdiction of the subject matter involved. Thus, for example, inquiries into the condition of small business might well be assigned to a standing subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Eighth. Modernization of the congressional committee structure, achieved by the Legislative Reorganization Act, was the keystone in the arch of congressional reform. To set up a series of special committees now would be a regressive step that might lead to the ultimate destruction of this fundamental reform.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon a question about the resolution submitted by him. Is he offering a resolution to amend a resolution he formerly submitted?

Mr. MORSE. I am substituting a substitute resolution for Senate Resolution 34. I asked unanimous consent for the privilege, and it was granted. It is a substitute resolution. It calls for an investigation of the courts-martial systems of the Army and Navy, said investigation to be conducted by the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MORSE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. To what committee was the first resolution referred?

Mr. MORSE. It called for a special committee, composed of four members from the Armed Services Committee and three from the Committee on the Judiciary. In effect what I did was to resubmit a resolution I presented in the Seventy-ninth Congress. I hope that my proposal for a substitute resolution shows that I can be convinced on the merits of a proposition and change my opinion accordingly. I am now of the opinion it would be a mistake to create another special committee, so I have offered a substitute resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator for his explanation. I understand the mechanics of the resolution now.

I now propound this parliamentary inquiry. To what committee will the substitute resolution be referred? As I understand, it is asking for a committee composed of members of the Armed Services Committee and the Judiciary Committee. Or is it just the Armed Services Committee?

Mr. MORSE. Just the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. I beg pardon. I understood the Senator to say he would be glad to have the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORSE. May I explain myself on that question?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. MORSE. The original resolution, Senate Resolution 34, called for a combined committee, made up of members of the Armed Services Committee and the Judiciary Committee. I do not care under what standing committee this investigation is conducted. If the Senate desires to change my resolution and have it conducted under the Judiciary Committee as a standing committee, that is all right with me, but I do not want it conducted under a special committee as called for by the wording of my resolution when I first introduced it.

Mr. WHERRY. Not under a special committee?

Mr. MORSE. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY and Mr. GURNEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. Did the Chair answer my inquiry as to the committee to which the first resolution was referred?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair it should go to the Committee on Armed Services, but the present occupant of the Chair recognizes that that is a debatable question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota was on his feet first. The Chair recognizes him.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield in order that I may ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. GURNEY. In a moment I shall be glad to yield. I have only a brief statement to make.

I believe our new committee is going to be very close to the armed services, and therefore will be in very good position to proceed under such a resolution as has just been submitted by the Senator from Oregon.

I wish also to point out to the Senate that if the investigation were conducted by the Committee on Armed Services it would be unnecessary for the several departments of national defense to appear before other committees, and they might be able to present their views better to the committee to which they are used to come. I think my committee can handle this matter satisfactorily. Of course, if it does not, the Committee on the Judiciary could take the matter up at any time it desired.

SENATORS' INCOMES AND VOTING RECORDS, AMENDMENT OF CLOTURE RULE, AND PREPARATION OF SENATE PRECEDENTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I submit another resolution which combines certain other resolutions I have heretofore offered. It is submitted "in order to provide more democracy in the operations of the United States Senate and to enable the United States Senate more effectively to discharge its responsibilities under the Constitution."

The resolution covers the following heads:

Registration of amounts and sources of Senators' incomes;

Publication of Senators' voting records;

Control of Senate filibuster;

Open publication of Senate precedents.

The resolution (S. Res. 57), submitted by Mr. MORSE (for himself and Mr. TAYLOR), was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, In order to provide more democracy in the operations of the United States Senate and to enable the United States Senate more effectively to discharge its responsibilities under the Constitution—

REGISTRATION OF AMOUNTS AND SOURCES OF SENATORS' INCOMES

(a) That every Member of the United States Senate shall, not later than 30 days following the date of agreement to this resolution, and on the 2d day of January of each year thereafter, file with the Secretary of the Senate a report containing a full and complete statement of—

(1) the amount and sources of all income received by such Member during the preceding year, including all fees, salaries, income from trusts or estates and dividends received or credited to his account, and, if such income is derived from a law firm or partnership, the names of the clients of such firm or partnership from whom fees were received; and

(2) all dealings in securities or commodities by such Member, or by any person acting on behalf of, or pursuant to the direction of, such Member during the preceding year.

(b) As used in this resolution—

(1) The term "person" includes an individual, partnership, trust, estate, association, corporation, or society.

(2) The term "security" means security as defined in section 2 of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 77b).

(3) The term "commodity" means commodity as defined in section 2 of the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended (U. S. C., title 7, sec. 2).

(4) The term "dealings in securities or commodities" means any acquisition, holding, withholding, use, transfer, disposition, or other transaction involving any security or commodity.

PUBLICATION OF SENATORS' VOTING RECORD

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to compile and to publish within 3 weeks after the close of the present session of Congress a tabulation of the voting record of its Members on all roll-call votes, together with brief descriptions of the issues voted upon. For the purpose of easy readability and quick reference, each Member's votes shall be gathered in one place. The Superintendent of Documents shall sell copies at cost, and shall print sufficient copies so that a supply is on hand at all times.

CONTROL OF SENATE FILIBUSTER

SEC. 3. (a) That rule III of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"RULE III

"COMMENCEMENT OF DAILY SESSIONS

"1. The Presiding Officer having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, and any mistake made in the entries corrected. The reading of the Journal shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent; and when any motion shall be made to amend or correct the same, it shall be deemed a privileged question, and proceeded with until disposed of, except that it shall be displaced by the action of the Presiding Officer in submitting to the Senate for an aye-and-nay vote any question under rule XXII. If the question submitted under rule XXII is decided in the affirmative by a majority vote of those voting, the motion to amend or correct the Journal shall remain displaced until the measure which becomes the unfinished business under rule XXII is disposed of.

"2. A quorum shall consist of a majority of the Senators duly chosen and sworn."

"If at any time a motion to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure is signed by 16 Senators, any Senator signing such motion shall upon a request for recognition be recognized by the Chair for the purpose of presenting such motion to the Senate, and when such motion is so presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and 1 hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye-and-nay vote the question:

" 'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a majority vote of those voting, then said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Thereafter each Senator shall be entitled to speak in his own right on the pending measure, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same for an aggregate period of not more than 3 hours. Any Senator may yield to any other Senator the unexpired portion, or any part thereof, of the aggregate period of time which he is entitled to speak; and the Senator to whom he so yields may speak for the time so yielded in addition to any period of time which he is entitled to speak in his own right. It shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate. Notwithstanding the provisions of rule III, the reading of the Journal of the preceding day shall be dispensed with on days when the Senate is proceeding under the provisions of this paragraph.

"In any case in which a motion is filed under the provisions of this paragraph while a motion is pending under rule III to amend or correct the Journal of a preceding day, the term 'pending measure,' as used in the foregoing provisions of this paragraph, shall mean the measure which would be the pending measure if the Journal of all preceding days were approved."

OPEN PUBLICATION OF SENATE PRECEDENTS

SEC. 4. That the Parliamentarian of the Senate be authorized and directed to prepare a complete and annotated digest, with a full index, of the precedents and the decisions on points of order in the Senate down to the close of the Seventy-ninth Congress, and that 1,000 copies be printed and bound for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Chair to which committee the new resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon is referred?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This particular resolution, in the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, should go to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understood it, it was a resolution authorizing a subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon is the one to provide more democracy in the operations of the United States Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the ruling made on the ground that the Committee on Rules and Administration is more democratic than any other committee?

COMMITTEE INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to call to the attention of the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Illinois, the two ranking members of the Committee on Rules and Administration, a suggestion which might be of some benefit in aiding Senators who are interested in a subject which is referred to a committee of which they are not members. For example, suppose a Senator wants to have an investigation of wool. He may not be a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which in my judgment would be the committee properly to undertake such an investigation. Therefore he draws his resolution and it goes to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. He feels, perhaps, that no member of that committee wants to look into the matter, which is of vital interest to his constituents and to himself. I suggest to the majority members of the Committee on Rules and Administration for their consideration that when a Senator asks for a special investigation of some matter and the request goes to a committee of which he himself is not a member, a rule be provided which will allow him, in connection with the special subject, to sit on the committee as an ex officio member, without vote, so that he may be the "advocate," so to speak, of the policy he deems adequate, and so that he may be present. He should not have a vote because he might be a Democrat, and that might make the membership of the committees even, or he might be a Republican, and that might make the vote overwhelmingly one way. But I think there is a real need to permit a Senator who wants an investigation of something to be, if he desires, ex officio, a member of the committee or subcommittee which has jurisdiction over a given resolution providing for a special investigation.

Mr. WHERRY. I wish to thank the distinguished Senator for his remarks. I think they have merit, and they present the reason why I desired to get information on the particular resolution the Senator from Oregon seeks to amend.

I think there is some merit in the Rules Committee membership having some knowledge of what the standing committees are doing with resolutions referred to them, in cases in which there is no advocate on the particular committee of the resolution submitted.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I know of no business ready to be taken up at this time——

Mr. MURRAY rose.

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

STUDY OF PROBLEMS OF SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. MURRAY. I desire to address the Senate at this time in support of Resolution No. 20, offered by the very able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], providing for the establishment of a Special Senate Committee To Study the Problems of Small Business.

I shall not undertake to discuss the effect of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 on the policy of the Senate in reference to the continuance of special committees, as that will be debated at length, I understand, by other Senators who are better prepared to discuss it.

I believe it would be unfortunate if the act precluded the continuance in some instances of effective committees for the aid and protection of small-business enterprises.

It has been my privilege in the past 6 years to serve as chairman of the present Small Business Committee. The life of that committee will expire at the end of this month, and the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska would set up a new committee of the same character, to the end that it might continue the program in aid of small business which the Senate had in mind in establishing the original committee.

The original committee was established in October 1940, pursuant to a resolution offered by me authorizing and directing a study and survey of the problems of small business enterprise and the securing of the necessary facts and information which might aid the Congress in enacting remedial legislation in the interest of preserving independent small business enterprise in America.

Mr. President, the need for such a program has widespread recognition in the country. Notwithstanding the enormous contribution small business enterprise has made in the development of our economic system and the political democracy upon which it rests, it is a conceded fact that the great concentration of business and industry and the growth of monopoly during the last half century has created many difficult problems which are threatening the survival of small business.

In practically every industry in the country, a few powerful organizations dominate the field. They possess unequal advantages, such as easier access to financing, more favorable interest rates, freight and power rates, and taxes. These special advantages and privileges render it difficult for small concerns to compete when the large concerns seek to grab the market.

Over the years, the impact of monopoly practices upon small business has caused the disappearance of thousands of small independent enterprises in manufacturing, wholesale, and retail trades. As a consequence of these conditions, thousands of small businessmen all over the country for a long time have been looking to the Congress for protection and relief.

These conditions were sufficient in 1940 to justify the Congress in singling out this issue and providing for its study and solution through the establishment of the Special Senate Committee on Small Business Problems.

Small businessmen brought their problem to the Senate Small Business Committee and to a similar committee which had been set up in the House of Representatives. The Senate committee immediately undertook a study of these problems. A committee staff was set up and hearings and studies were commenced. But in 1941, while the Congress was in the midst of its studies of the problems affecting small business, the war started, creating still more difficult problems in this field. So great was the life and death struggle of small independent business as the war-preparedness program got under way that the committee was diverted from investigation of long-range problems and was forced to take up the more immediate task of cushioning the shock of the war on small business.

When the war broke out in Europe, the War Department apparently had no conception of what was going to happen in this country. There was no program whatever for the utilization of small plants of the country in war production. Because of scarcity of materials, they were finding it impossible to remain in civilian production. Yet at first they were denied access to war contracts.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I should like to ask the very able Senator from Montana what legislation he considers to have been passed for the benefit of small business enterprises in the country through recommendations of the Small Business Committee.

Mr. MURRAY. If the Senator inquires about legislation that was passed, I should answer by saying that we passed legislation, at the very commencement of the activities of the committee, to protect and relieve the automobile dealers of the Nation, who were affected by the action of the Government in stopping the production of automobiles, particularly pleasure cars.

Mr. MAYBANK. Did the Special Committee on Small Business sponsor that legislation?

Mr. MURRAY. The Small Business Committee sponsored that legislation.

Mr. MAYBANK. Was it not the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. MURRAY. No. The bill went to the Committee on Banking and Currency, perhaps; but it was introduced by me, representing the Small Business Committee.

Mr. MAYBANK. Did not the Banking and Currency Committee also hold hearings on it?

Mr. MURRAY. The Banking and Currency Committee also held hearings.

Mr. MAYBANK. And they did not call witnesses?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes; that is true.

Mr. MAYBANK. Then there was a duplication of effort?

Mr. MURRAY. I should not consider it a duplication, because the Small Business Committee had not held extensive hearings. They went into the matter in conference with representatives of the automobile dealers, and they introduced the bill because it was necessary to act promptly in the matter. Over 60,000 automobile dealers in the country were facing bankruptcy, unless speedy relief was accorded them.

Mr. MAYBANK. What I meant to ask the Senator was this: Did the Small Business Committee report favorably in its own name any legislation on this subject?

Mr. MURRAY. No.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Small Business Committee merely recommended certain legislation to the Banking and Currency Committee or to other committees?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. MAYBANK. And those other committees found it necessary to hold public hearings before reporting the legislation?

Mr. MURRAY. The Small Business Committee was not given the power and authority, itself, to report bills to the Senate.

Mr. MAYBANK. Will the resolution the Senator is discussing give it the power to act?

Mr. MURRAY. I have not studied the resolution, but my understanding is that it is in the same language as the other and follows the provisions of the original resolution, which set up the committee in 1940.

It was only through the active efforts of the Senate Small Business Committee that we finally brought about a recognition of the need of utilizing small manufacturing plants in war production. The committee performed an invaluable service in bringing about the mobilization of small manufacturing concerns in the war-production program and also in aiding other concerns unable to participate in war production to continue in civilian production.

From its very inception, the committee worked as a bipartisan committee entirely without political consideration or party advantage. It ignored political considerations and directed its activities earnestly to the preservation of the small independent business structure in our economy, which is the very foundation of American democracy.

I cannot take the time now to detail all the activities of the committee over the war period. At the commencement of the war, when the Government ordered stoppage of automobile production and froze the stocks of new cars in dealers' hands, a desperate situation was created for 60,000 automobile dealers throughout the country. With large plants and investments on their hands and their business disrupted by the Government orders, they faced bankruptcy. In desperation they appealed to our committee for help. Without delay the committee worked out a program to aid these dealers and other concerns affected by the regulations, rationing scarce articles and commodities in meeting the conditions confronting them.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IVES in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Montana, who has been the chairman of the so-called Small Business Committee during all the time since its inception——

Mr. MURRAY. That is correct, and I submitted the original resolution creating the committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it not true that because of the aid given small business by the committee during the war, contracts for war materials were given to small businessmen in every State of the Nation?

Mr. MURRAY. In every State in the Union; yes.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator believe that the small businessmen throughout the country would have received such war contracts if it had not been for the committees of the Senate and House which served as vocal organs for small business?

Mr. MURRAY. If it had not been for such committees the small businessmen of the country would not have had the opportunity to receive such war contracts. By reason of the aid thus furnished, small businessmen sought to secure contracts and were able to secure them. They were not equipped with the machinery and the plants to take on some contracts, and it was necessary to secure financial aid for them. Others who could not secure war contracts, or who were unable to secure materials, were helped to continue in civilian production. So, small businessmen were helped in both ways.

Mr. WHERRY. It is asserted that the war is now over, that the war contracts have all been awarded, and that there will be no new war contracts. But I ask the distinguished Senator from Montana, the chairman of the so-called Small Business Committee, if it is not true that the small businessmen during the past 6 years have appeared before the Senate Small Business Committee and a similar committee of the House, because there was the place they could secure help in obtaining contracts, and in other ways? Does not the Senator further feel that until the standing committees of the Senate are properly organized, when perhaps other procedure shall be established, that the present Senate special committee should continue, at least during the present session, to be the advocate of the small businessmen, and to be the one committee where the small businessman can come, in view of the fact that he has heretofore been taught to come for aid to that committee during the past 6 years?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Nebraska has stated the situation exactly. The small businessmen of the country had no other place to go except to this committee, and it was as the result of very great pressure on the part of the committee that we were finally able to induce the War Department and the Navy Department to recognize the need of giving contracts to the smaller business concerns.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the distinguished Senator from Montana in his speech advance further reasons for the continuance of the committee at this time? I have reference to hearings which the distinguished Senator would like to conduct. It is my understanding, from conversations and conferences with the Senator, that there are some very important hearings which should be held, and that the distinguished Senator is waiting until the committee is reorganized in order that such hearings may be held.

Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. The committee has heretofore done the preliminary work, has it not?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes. We were ready to proceed with such hearings last month, but in view of the fact that Congress was in the process of reorganization, and that the new majority party was going to take charge, the hearings were delayed.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator further if it is not true that the country is under a considerable amount of regulation even now? At this time the question of priorities is still involved in many instances through different agencies of the Government. We still have controls; do we not? We still have priorities. There are contracts yet to be let by the Department of Agriculture and by other Government agencies which involve small businessmen. Is it not a fact that until that work is taken over by the standing committees, if standing committees are to do it, during the intervening period some committee such as the Small Business Committee should serve the small businessmen?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, at that point will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. In view of the fine record the Small Business Committee has made, as brought out by the questions just asked by the able Senator from Nebraska, I should like to ask him a question. As this is a nonpartisan proposition, and we are all interested in the promotion of small business, and because we do not want to change a committee which has been working on the subject, and based on all the other arguments that have been adduced to support the position of maintaining a small business committee, I should like to ask the able Senator if he would not be in favor of having the Senator from Montana continue as chairman of that committee, so we could make sure that the work he has inaugurated would be carried on?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am glad indeed to say to the Members of the Senate that I think the distinguished Senator from Montana has done an able job, just as the Senator from Maryland has done an able job in the committees of which he is a member. I should be glad to suggest, if it came to me to decide, that both Senators should be placed upon the Small Business Committee, to continue in the work of that committee, if they would like to be placed on the committee.

I think this is the time to call to the attention of those who are interested in continuing the work of special committees which cut across standing committee lines, that if such continuation can be shown to be justified, it should be done. The way to do it is to call attention to what the committees have done, and if a committee has given a good account of itself by reason of services well performed, I think the place to give such justification is here on the Senate floor, and I am doing so this afternoon.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana again yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator from Nebraska has been not only generous but factual, and that is the best kind of generosity. But I know that we all simply ache and we all are most anxious in the most impartial way to see that the small businessman of this Republic not only receives a fair deal, but a little bit more than a fair deal, if we can give it to him, because we are not unmindful of the giant concerns which usurp all the prerogatives of ordinary commerce and movements in the channels of trade. Therefore, as we have had such eloquent testimony respecting the work the so-called Small Business Committee has done under the able chairmanship of the Senator from Montana, I think it would be a step backward, that we would be going back to the "horse and buggy" days, if it were not continued under his chairmanship, and——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Permit me to finish.

Mr. WHERRY. I ask the Senator if he will not yield for a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well.

Mr. WHERRY. The reason the Senator from Montana has been such an able chairman of the committee is that he had members of the then minority party working hard with him, and that they have endeavored in every way to assist the chairman in his efforts. I believe the chairman will tell the Senator from Maryland that the work of the committee has been done by a nonpartisan group. We honor the chairman for that.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the work has been done by a nonpartisan group, then I can conceive of no better way to continue the nonpartisan effort than for the able Senator from Montana to continue so that the small businessmen of the Republic will receive a square deal.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, to show the Senate that I am nonpartisan, I should like to have the committee continued, and I should like to have seven Republican Members on it, and five Democratic Senators on it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I wish to say that during its entire life there were never any problems arising between the Democrats and the Republicans serving on that committee. I think that in practically every instance when we introduced a bill to correct unfortunate conditions in order to benefit small business the action of the committee was unanimous. It was so in connection with the bill which we brought forward to help the automobile dealers. It was true also when we set up the Smaller War Plants Corporation. I think in practically every case where the committees took action on any problem affecting small business we had the full cooperation of the Republican members of the committee. In fact, they were very helpful to us. We had some businessmen on that committee. One was the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], who gave us considerable support in connection with the problems we had before the committee at different times. There is no problem with reference to politics so far as the committee is concerned. I think it has done an excellent job.

An act sponsored by the committee to relieve automobile dealers was Public Law 549, regulating the handling of certain articles and commodities rationed under the authority of the United States. Through this law we obtained relief not only for automobile dealers but for all wholesalers and retailers whose stocks and funds were frozen by war orders, providing also Government assistance in carrying their interest charges and regulating the disposal of their goods.

Closely related to the automobile dealers' problems at that time was the situation of the 300,000 independent tire dealers. By hearings, inquiries, correspondence, and otherwise, the committee was able to render valuable service to this section of our economy in the war period.

By enactment of a special resolution following our investigations in the automobile-servicing field alone some 300,000 independent businesses in the United States were not only saved from extinction but were provided with materials which enabled them to carry on all through the war effort supplying essential automotive parts and making repairs without which the civilian and military transportation of the Nation would have been greatly impaired.

When the bakery trade of the country was threatened with bankruptcy through the rationing of fats and oils, the committee held prompt hearings which resulted in immediate relief for that industry, preventing the bankruptcy of thousands of small bakeries and preventing great inconvenience to the public.

We secured passage of legislation creating the Smaller War Plants Corporation, which channeled war contracts into small business establishments, enabling many thousands of small business firms to make a remarkable contribution to our wartime accomplishments.

We prevailed upon the War and Navy Departments to set up special procedures for channeling Government contracts into small local firms. We policed the regulatory machinery set up by the control agencies, the War Production Board, and the Office of Price Administration, breaking many a bottleneck, thereby obtaining relief for small business firms unable to maintain lobbies or representatives to plead their case at the Nation's Capital.

The plight of small retailers and wholesalers handling hosiery, dry goods, lumber, groceries, and general merchandise in the many thousands of stores over this broad land was early brought to our committee. We held hearings which resulted in maintaining their normal channels of trade, kept them in business, and enabled them to get a share of the necessarily scarce consumer goods. Small meat packers were the victims of regulations which unduly favored the big processors; and again we were asked to intercede, with the result that a substantial revision of subsidy payments and slaughtering quotas were made in their favor.

We took a most active part in framing the surplus property legislation, seeing to it that priorities were included which have made it possible for small business to obtain a fair share of surplus plants, goods, and equipment.

These are but illustrative of the many successful efforts made by the Senate Small Business Committee in behalf of the small business community. They were accomplished by means of the loyal and diligent work of the entire Democratic and Republican membership of the committee and its small, hard-working staff of experts. Practically every action which was taken was the result of unanimous agreement. The money costs of maintaining the committee during the 6 years of its life are an infinitesimal fraction of the actual money saved American business and the people of this country.

All of this wartime effort in behalf of independent small business accomplished one major purpose, namely, the survival and readiness of a healthy, awakened small business economy to participate in reconversion and peacetime activities. I shudder to think what the condition of independent American small business would have been had this effort not been so successful.

But the program which the Senate Small Business Committee was called upon to carry out has not been completed, namely, the investigation of the long-range problems of American small business. We have carried on studies of long-range problems to the extent that time allowed. By arrangement with the Smaller War Plants Corporation, a study of the effect of the war years on American business has been made. This was published as Economic Concentration and World War II, a 359-page document packed full of startling facts showing that despite all of the efforts made in behalf of independent competitive business, the war years saw such a concentration of economic power develop in the hands of a few industrial giants that today this constitutes the greatest single threat to the survival of the free enterprise system in the United States.

In a final report of my chairmanship of 6 years of effort of the Senate Small Business Committee, I later intend to present in some detail the bearing of big business concentration on the future of independent business.

I am prepared to offer more than 50 major recommendations intended to arrest the damaging growth of monopoly and thereby give independent business in the country a fair and equal chance to get under way, develop, and grow strong in a competitive situation, guaranteed under our Democratic system and its safeguarding institutions. Many of these recommendations are new, but long overdue. Others have been heretofore presented to the Congress and must be urged again and again until action results. The evils these remedies seek to correct have already gripped our economic system in what may well prove to be a death struggle.

In an article appearing in the Atlantic Monthly for January 1947, Joseph and Stewart Alsop said:

> But the sad fact is that "free enterprise" is as dead in Europe today and throughout the world except in the United States as the Holy Roman Empire.

I am not an alarmist. Nevertheless, I feel sure that anyone intelligently viewing the world scene today cannot fail to recognize that the situation requires immediate action. Already competitive private enterprise has been abolished in many major countries. Even before the war, three of the largest nations in Europe—Russia, Germany, and Italy—had abandoned it and other nations were threatening to follow their lead. Free competition is disappearing with alarming rapidity all over the world. It is so weakened in our own country by the tremendous growth of monopoly and concentration of wealth as to force President Truman to declare in his state of the Union message that this constitutes a major problem for immediate attention of the Congress.

Mr. President, imposing evidence of the value of the Senate Small Business Committee is found in the many hundreds of letters from individual businessmen and representative business associations and organizations which have come to me in recent weeks while the question of committee continuance has been pending.

I do not want to burden the RECORD with a long reading of these impressive testimonials to the accomplishments of the committee, but I want to mention one or two of them.

So effective has been our work in behalf of the many hundreds of small miners scattered over most Western States, for example, that their journal, Pay Dirt, in the December 1946 issue said, in part:

> We who are concerned with the problems of the mining industry are vitally interested in the fate of the Senate Small Business Committee. It would be a tremendous setback to United States mining, and especially to the small mines which some day will be our large ones, if the splendid work of its Subcommittee on Mining and Minerals becomes only a matter of record of what happened in the Seventy-ninth Congress. * * * Never before have the small mine operators had a congressional group to which they could present their problems and obtain prompt action.

I ask that the entire editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACTION IS NEEDED RIGHT NOW

It was almost a hurricane that swept the country on November 5. There is no question but that the voters expressed themselves as wanting something different from what they had. Now the problem which faces the new powers that be is to sort out the good from the bad—retain that which is beneficial to the country and discard that which is considered harmful. There are mighty few so narrow and bigoted who will not admit that some of what we had is good enough to retain and to amplify.

Small business in the country, for instance, is vitally interested in what the situation will be after the Senate reorganization as to Senator MURRAY's Committee on Small Business. While MURRAY, being a Democrat, probably would not be chairman, he could be a potent part of a similar committee. His leadership in recognizing and attempting to solve the problems of small business knew no party designation and it is doubtful if he even knew the political beliefs of those he was serving. That committee did a fine job and it is a work that the Republicans should retain and amplify.

We who are concerned with the problems of the mining industry are vitally interested in the fate of the Subcommittee on Mining and Minerals Industry, for, if the Senate Small Business Committee disappears from the picture, its subcommittees will likewise fade out. It would be a tremendous setback to United States mining—and especially to the small mines which some day will be our large ones—if the splendid work of that subcommittee becomes only a matter of record of what happened in the Seventy-ninth Congress and does not carry forward into the Eightieth Congress.

It would be quite in accordance with political tradition that the dominating party be given the leadership, but it would be a disaster to have the new leaders take the attitude that everything which the old leaders did was wrong and should be discarded. No such mandate was given the new leaders. If they are wise—and we hope they are—they will build on all that was helpful and tear down that which was leading us away from true democracy.

The mining industry will watch anxiously for signs that the Senate Small Business Subcommittee on Mining and Minerals Industry will have the opportunity to complete for us in the Eightieth Congress the unfinished or uncompleted business of the Seventy-ninth, and that the extensive research work which has been done will bear fruit later.

Never before have the small mine operators had a congressional group to which they could present their problems and obtain prompt action. Such action has been tremendously important because it came from a committee with congressional force sufficient to compel an autocratic bureaucrat to be civil and human with Mr. John Q. Public. Members of that congressional group could smooth out arrogance for they had the power to beat it down if it was not smoothed out.

The mining industry, both large and small operators, is interested in a continuance of the work of the Mining and Minerals Industry Subcommittee, and we should take it upon ourselves individually to inform the newly elected Members of the Eightieth Congress that here is a worth-while work in progress, and it should be given the opportunity to carry on.

Senator MURRAY, of Montana, did a good job for small business, and it was not because those he served were Democrats or Republicans. It was because they were small and needed congressional help. He did a good job because he built up a capable organization within his committee and subcommittee, and that organization was serving industries and not political parties.

Let's let those in the Eightieth Congress know that here is a work that should be carried forward—congressional aid to small business and to small mine operators. There should, in fact, be a similar committee in the House.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. George C. Hatch, president of the New Council of American Small Business, telegraphed me on January 10, 1947, as follows:

New Council of American Business strongly feels that continuation of Senate Small Business Committee is absolutely essential to best interests of independent businessmen throughout America. The record of the committee thus far has shown imperative need of strengthening small business if system of private competitive enterprise is to endure. We urge that the work of the committee be extended and enlarged in scope by the new Congress.

The American Association of Small Business, with national headquarters in Washington, D. C., wrote me under date of January 10, 1947, over the signature of its president, Mr. Robert R. Hellyer:

I wish to put in your hands the attitude and convictions of the American Association of Small Business on the continuation of the Senate Small Business Committee * * *. The work of the Senate Small Business Committee, in its earnest endeavor constructively to solve the problems peculiar to small business, has attracted wide public attention * * *. Due to the fact that in the past there has been no organized effort on the part of small business to establish a national organization which could undertake to represent all classifications of small business before Senate committees, hundreds of small businessmen throughout the country found it necessary to journey to Washington to present their individual problems. Due to the sincerity with which the committee welcomed all petitioners, and because of the thoroughness with which such particular problems were examined in open hearings, the committees were enabled to get first-hand the frank views of hundreds of men in small business who otherwise never had been enabled successfully to present their problems.

Thus, small business was afforded opportunities, as full as the petitioners themselves desired, to submit their cases in a national forum. In many instances through public hearings and through the expert aid of its investigators and economists, businessmen were enabled intelligently and thoroughly to bring the economic plight of small business to the attention of their representatives in the national legislature * * *. We know of no other committee of the Congress whose functions so successfully have operated to reach the "grassroots" of industry and distribution throughout all sections of the country.

Mr. President, I regret that I find myself not in accord with many of my colleagues whose judgment I generally hold in high respect. Nevertheless, I am supporting the resolution of the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] to establish a Senate Small Business Committee because I am convinced by my experience on the committee that such action is absolutely necessary if we are going to protect small business enterprise. I do not believe that a subcommittee of a general standing committee could do the job as effectively as could a special committee, and I believe that it is in the interest and welfare not only of the small businessmen but of the whole country that the Senate reorganize the Small Business Committee and permit it to go forward with its investigations and studies in an effort to support small business enterprise in America.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I thought the Senator was about to conclude his remarks, and I did not want to interrupt him if he had not about concluded.

I think probably the Senator can explain something that rather puzzles me. The Senator is or was the chairman of the Small Business Committee, which was created pursuant to a resolution which I presume he submitted?

Mr. MURRAY. That is correct.

Mr. HATCH. I notice that the committee has terminated.

Mr. MURRAY. It will be terminated at the end of this month. It is still a live committee. A resolution was adopted which extended it until the end of January.

Mr. HATCH. I observe that the resolution which is now on our desks contains a specific provision in section 3 that the committee which was heretofore created is "terminated" by express action, while by the resolution another committee, a new one, is to be created and set up. Is there any difference in the powers? I am puzzled about the provisions.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I might point out to the distinguished Senator that it was difficult, in view of the representation on the old committee of seven to five, to continue the committee, because the membership of the committee would now be in the ratio of six to five. The only Senator falling out was Senator Mead, of New York. The legislative counsel has already drafted the provisions of the original resolution, as amended from time to time, extending in full force the authority and powers of the committee as they have heretofore existed. After that was done it was suggested that we would have to terminate this committee as of some date. I should be glad, if the distinguished Senator from Montana would like to have me do so, to put into the resolution a provision that the committee as now constituted shall terminate on January 31, in keeping with the statute.

Mr. MURRAY. Yes; that was my intention.

Mr. WHERRY. It was in order to reconstitute the committee, with the representation to which it is entitled, that we had to terminate the old one; but we are asking the formation of the new one exactly under the provisions of the original resolution and the resolutions which have continued it from time to time. Section 3 of Senate Resolution 20 requires the termination of the old committee because of the representation feature. I should be glad now to amend section 3 so that the committee will be terminated as of January 31, 1947.

Mr. MURRAY. I will make that request when the resolution comes up.

Mr. HATCH. That part of the resolution seemed to me to be unusual, and I wondered if the purposes or the powers of the committee were being changed.

Mr. WHERRY. In no way whatever. The only reason for terminating the present committee was to reorganize it on a basis of representation of 7 to 5. I have talked with the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and I think that will be agreed to, so far as the membership of the committee is concerned and so far as we are concerned.

Mr. MURRAY. I did not understand what the membership division would be.

Mr. WHERRY. The membership of the committee was originally five. Then it was increased to seven. I think Senate Resolution 66 increased the membership to 12. That was done by resolution. There were seven Democrats and five Republicans. That is the exact number provided in Senate Resolution 20, except that the representation, so far as parties are concerned, will be reversed.

ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I know of nothing further to come before the Senate this afternoon, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Wednesday, January 15, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MONDAY, JANUARY 13, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Redeemer and our Lord, as we come to the throne of grace, we pray for a richer life in Thee. Fulfill in us the promise: Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free. There is nothing more glorious than the knowledge of Thy truth, with its spiritual and moral application, which bids the weak be strong, the bad be good, the unjust be upright, and the unclean be pure. Wherever there is oppression, repression, and injustice, Thy holy arm make bare. Come Thou in wonderful evolution in the thoughts and spirits and lives of men, and let Thy divine impulse rest upon us, O Christ. In Thy name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 10, 1946, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

THE LATE LYNN J. FRAZIER

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty this morning to announce the passing of former United States Senator from North Dakota, Lynn J. Frazier.

The Senator was a graduate from Mayville Normal and the State university. While at the university I had the pleasure of playing with him on the same football team for 4 years. His fairness, honesty, and determination were respected by all the other players. No player ever found fault with any decision of Captain Frazier.

After graduation he followed agriculture, and became one of the successful farmers in Pembina County. Then in 1916, without his knowledge or consent, he was endorsed by the original Nonpartisan Leaguers as their candidate for Governor.

Known only in some parts of the State by those who knew and were acquainted with him in college, he became a formidable candidate overnight, and in the June primaries he was nominated as the Republican candidate by a large majority. He was elected in the general election of that year by a vote of over 4 to 1.

During his first term as Governor, the opposition had a majority in the State senate, and blocked most of the important progressive legislation that he sponsored. In the 1918 campaign, however, the issues were clear and clean-cut. The Governor was renominated and reelected by a large majority, and with him a two-thirds majority of his supporters in both the State house and senate.

During the 1919 session of the State legislature, the Bank of North Dakota—the only bank in the United States owned, operated, and controlled by the sovereign people of the State—was established. No one in the State would now be without this bank, although this legislation was bitterly opposed at the time.

In the same session the State mill and elevator was established, State hail insurance was rewritten and made workable, workmen's compensation—perhaps the most liberal up to that time in the Nation—State bonding of public officials and State insurance of public buildings were passed. These were a few of the many progressive laws sponsored by Governor Frazier.

It was but natural that to such program there was bitter opposition. But I may state that today there are few in the State—businessman, farmer, or laborer—who would change or abolish any of these institutions.

Governor Frazier realized that that which was for the best interest of the greatest number was best for all. He realized that there was a line between private industry and monopoly. He believed that there were some things that all the people—the State—could do better for all the people than a few monopolies.

Senator Frazier was honored and respected by all who knew him. Even his opponents knew that he was just, and that they could depend on him. Always brutually frank yet just to his enemies and friends alike.

Senator Frazier's earthly existence has ended. He has gone on that journey from which as yet none has returned. But the memory of Senator Frazier and his accomplishments will live and grow as the years go by. His accomplishments as Governor and as United States Senator has made the State of North Dakota, and the Nation, a better place to live in.

In the Senate he was coauthor of the Frazier-Lemke moratorium which has saved the homes of at least 250,000 farm families. He was coauthor of the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill that finally resulted in lowering the interest on Federal farm loans from 5 to 3½ percent. He was the coauthor of the cost-of-production bill—which is the only solution to the agricultural problem.

I know that those who know of his work will agree with me that Senator Frazier was a statesman—not a politician. We sympathize with his family and many friends.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

DETROIT EXTENDS INVITATION FOR 1952 OLYMPIAD

Mr. YOUNGBLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNGBLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced into the House my first bill as a Member of the Congress of the United States. To the membership of this body my proposed measure is relatively unimportant, but to me and the civic and industrial leaders of Detroit it is a resolution of significant import. It provides that an invitation be extended to the International Olympic Committee which will meet in Stockholm, Sweden, in June of this year, to hold the 1952 Olympic games in the United States.

If the invitation is accepted, Detroit will be one of the leading contenders to be host to these games. A delegation of prominent and responsible Detroit men will be in Stockholm when the invitation is formally presented. Some of the active civic leaders in my home city have requested that I sponsor this concurrent resolution in the hope that the 1952 Olympiad may be brought to America's fourth city 5 years hence. Detroit is far to the forefront in staging affairs of such magnitude and entertaining royalty and representatives of all phases of business and society of foreign lands. It is also accustomed to taking its place as one of the great sport centers of the Nation. It has played host to world-series crowds in baseball; been the scene of the national hockey play-offs, and saw its professional football team triumph in the championship series in recent years. During World War II sporting events and other gatherings were curtailed while all Detroit literally rolled up its sleeves and went to work in the war effort to justify its designation as the arsenal of democracy. Now, in peacetime, it has another ambition—to, come 1952, earn the designation of the playground of all nations.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AND THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND (H. DOC. NO. 53)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read by the Clerk and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with section 4 (b) (5) of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, there is transmitted herewith a report by the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems with respect to the participation of the United States in the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and in the International Monetary Fund to October 31, 1946.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 13, 1947.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after disposition of the legislative business and any other special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JONKMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a copy of a letter from a constituent to Philip Murray, of the CIO, and also a letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Mr. HOEVEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by the adjutant general of the State of Iowa.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Lewistown Journal and a biographical article from the Portland Sunday Telegram on the senior Senator from Maine.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. REED of New York (at the request of Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin) was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a table on sugar.

Mr. MUNDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, in one to include a speech delivered by Ted Malone of the American Broadcasting Co. on the opening session of the Eightieth Congress, and in the other an address delivered by the president of the National Teachers' Association in Chicago.

THE SOCIALIST GOVERNMENT OF ENGLAND

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STEVENSON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, the people of Britain apparently are tired of socialism and Government ownership of public utilities, because they are now distributing pamphlets throughout England which read as follows:

Leaflet No. 1:

The people of Britain who fought from 1939–45 for freedom from oppression.

Wot! No coal?

There are more civil servants than hewers of coal.

How about their changing jobs?

Leaflet No. 2:

The cotton market at Liverpool— * * * hub of the world's trade closed by official orders. Why? Because it was private enterprise! * * * so it simply had to go.

Leaflet No. 3:

When we're sitting around fireless grates let us remember that we own the mines!

Leaflet No. 4:

State doctor—

"Now just sit up in bed and sign here—and here—and here.

"And fill out this form.

"And get three neighbors to vouch for it.

"And remember the pains and penalties of perjury!

"Then I will look at your tongue."

Leaflet No. 5:

Leaflet No. 6:

Every brick of the house we have not got has been zoned, rationed, allocated, prioritied, and planned. So perfect is the official scheme that every hod of mortar is certified under seal to be free from private profit and wholly devoted to national interest. How happy this makes us as we double up with our cheerful relatives.

Leaflet No. 7:

Our quids go down the drain.

Another deficit added to the debt, and our Government obligations (bonds) buy less and less of more and more of what we haven't got.

Leaflet No. 8:

When we are parked with relatives and the kids are hungry, it helps a bit to know—

We own the Bank of England.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST THE RICE FARMERS

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am sending to the desk for introduction a resolution for the purpose of correcting present inequities as they pertain to a great class of our rural citizenship, the farmers whose money crop is rice.

Under the present control policies as administered by the executive branch of our Government, the rice farmers have not been treated fairly, and it is imperative that immediate action be taken. It would have been far better if this action had been taken long ago, and certainly when the Executive order removing certain other OPA controls was issued, the rice farmer should then have been given adequate protection.

As I understand it, present controls are left on rice for the express purpose of implementing the Government's purchase program for overseas shipment. Thus, we find that our citizens' own Government is discriminating against them for the benefit of foreign peoples. It would be better to remove these price controls and, if the price should go slightly higher, let the tax burden be shared equally. As it now is, the rice farmer must forego a part of his profit and then pay an equal share of taxes for the purchase of this rice. This, in effect, causes the rice farmers and producers to pay twice for the price of rice to be sent to foreign nations. The rice farmers, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, are not financially able to carry this double taxation, and my resolution is introduced for the purpose of correcting this unfair situation and condition.

In my district in eastern Arkansas there are many fine men who earn food and clothing for their families through the cultivation and sale of rice. These men have been having a difficult time. They need every dollar they can earn. They were, it is true, given a recent increase of a dollar a barrel for rice, but this increase did little to assist them, and the increase in many cases did not raise the price to the levels prevailing before OPA controls were imposed. Thus, we find that this large group of agricultural workingmen, whose families rely on their earnings for food, clothing, and housing, have, by force of law, been prevented from sharing in the general rise of earnings. Rather, they have been forced to live on a level lower than even the prewar scale and have suffered increased costs and taxations.

It is well to be charitable to foreign nations. Charity is a characteristic of the Christian mind; but charity, Mr. Speaker, begins at home. In this case, the rice farmers ask you to be charitable enough to give them a fair deal. They ask that we remove the controls that penalize their wives and children to benefit certain favored foreign nations. I ask that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture in order that immediate action may be taken.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WORLEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

RECENT AIR CRASHES AND THE CAB AND CAA

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, the Nation is astounded to read the headlines of the morning papers telling of the crash of an Eastern air liner at Galax, Va., in which catastrophe 18 of her 19 passengers and crew members were killed.

The account of the crash in the newspapers indicates that this plane was at least 60 miles off course. This is absolutely inexcusable.

A few days ago we read another account, this time of the crash of an American air liner, bound from New York to Washington with a full passenger list. This plane had to return to New York and crash land on Jones' Beach. The facts in that case are these: That plane came down here with no alternate place to land, an inexcusable thing.

The appropriate committee of this House should forthwith start a very thorough investigation of these inexcusable crashes and killings of the American people. The American people are shocked and horrified. The American people are scared to death of flying. Those who want to ride on an airplane are afraid.

I believe the CAA should be thoroughly investigated, and I believe that the supreme court of the CAA, the CAB, should be investigated. The American people should know what is going on. There is something rotten in Denmark, there is something wrong with Eastern Air Lines, there is something wrong with American Airlines, there is something wrong with the whole doggone set-up, and something ought to be done about it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

CHANGE IN SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the 30 minutes granted me to address the House on Thursday be moved up to Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. And I wish to state that I intend to speak about the Budget, Mr. Speaker.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on Tuesday following the legislative program of the day and other special orders. I also wish to discuss certain aspects of the Budget on that date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CERTAIN VETERANS

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced an amendment to the GI bill of rights which would forbid payments by the Veterans' Administrator to schools which discriminate against veterans because of their race, religion, creed, or national origin.

A deplorable and shameful condition has been exposed in the American educational system which calls for immediate correction. Educational institutions which claim to be nonsectarian have denied their facilities to those veterans of World War II who belong to certain minority races or religions. Authoritative studies of admission practices of schools of higher learning made by the American Jewish Congress reveal that numerous veterans are unable to take advantage of the rights accorded them under the GI bill of rights because many schools have adopted a quota system limiting the number of Jews, Negroes, Catholics, and persons of Italian origin who may be admitted. The American Jewish Congress has conducted a comprehensive investigation into the admission practices of educational institutions. The statistical results compiled by this investigation, which conclusively demonstrate that discrimination against persons of particular races and religions prevails, have been widely accepted. The statistics of the American Jewish Congress have furnished the basis for an investigation by the City Council of the City of New York which resulted in a finding that discrimination on account of race, color, religion, and national origin exists and must be corrected by remedial legislation.

It is extremely regrettable that those who are returning from all parts of the world where they have been engaged in mortal combat to preserve democracy are confronted with the closed doors of educational institutions which practice discrimination. A GI who was not excluded from the hedgerows of Normandy or the beaches of Okinawa should not be excluded from the so-called educational institutions of our country. Discrimination by an educational institution against a veteran because of his color or religion strikes at the very heart of the democracy for which he fought. The American Government cannot and must not support those very practices for whose abolition we sacrificed the lives of thousands of our young men of all races, colors, and religions. The Government of the United States cannot and must not on the one hand grant them the opportunity to fight for the preservation of democracy and on the other, support denials of the opportunity to obtain higher education.

It is imperative that the Congress of the United States enact legislation which will empower the Veterans' Administrator to cease making further payments to educational institutions which, after attempts by conciliation and mediation, refuse to discontinue practices of discrimination against veterans belonging to certain minority races and religions. The amendment which I have introduced today may not eliminate this un-American practice, but it should at least stop these institutions from feeding at the public trough. There is no reason why the Government should subsidize un-American practices.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KLEIN], who has just addressed the House in favor of denying the benefits of veterans' legislation to ex-servicemen in the South or anywhere else where they maintain separate schools, wonders why there is so much racial disturbance in this country.

You say anything about a Jew, and he will get up and whine to high heaven; yet he comes in and tries to disturb every school system in the United States, and especially in the Southern States, by attempting to deny to our veterans the benefits of the GI bill of rights because of our separate school systems.

By such agitation he is not doing the people of his own race any good, but is doing the Negroes of the country infinite harm—while trying to punish the white servicemen who fought this Nation's battles in time of war and are now trying to rehabilitate themselves with the assistance of a grateful Government.

You know, and he knows, that his bill cannot pass, but he wants to get some cheap publicity propaganda over.

He will probably get it tomorrow in the Communist Daily Worker.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the special orders for today I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes on postwar economic conditions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have a special order to address the House for 30 minutes on Wednesday next. I ask unanimous consent that I may have the same time on Thursday at the conclusion of any special orders heretofore entered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I obtained unanimous consent to extend certain material in the RECORD. I am informed by the Public Printer that this will exceed two pages of the RECORD and will cost $570, but I ask that it be printed notwithstanding that fact.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

REDUCTION OF INCOME TAX ON RETIREMENT PAYMENTS

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that this session of Congress should do something toward lowering existing income taxes. I feel, however, that some discretion should be used in the methods employed in order to accomplish these reductions.

Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a bill which I am about to introduce providing an exemption up to the amount of $1,440 on all retirement pensions, allowances, and annuity payments made by the Federal Government or any State or any political subdivision thereof. I am filing this bill because I believe there are in this country many former school teachers, firemen, policemen, and other public servants who are not able at this time to live properly on the amount of the annuities which they are receiving.

I hope that this bill will be given favorable consideration in committee and by the Congress.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

PORTAL-TO-PORTAL PAY LAWSUITS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the press gives us the information that up to last Friday suits calling for the payment of over $4,000,000,000 have been filed ostensibly on behalf of employees against employers to recover for overtime work. Some folks refer to those suits as actions for portal-to-portal pay. Many wonder how it happens that suddenly all over this country there has broken out an epidemic of lawsuits for overtime pay. Just why it is that if millions of workers were entitled to pay for overtime for work done back in 1940 and subsequent years, the workers themselves either never knew of it or never thought of presenting their demands, of bringing suit. The very delay leads to the conclusion that many of the present suits are brought to collect something that the workers themselves did not think they were entitled to receive.

The query naturally suggested is: Is someone other than the workers back of these suits? Are those who advised and instigated them interested, not in overtime pay, but in the fees which might be collected, in obtaining for themselves, say, 20, 30, or 50 percent of the sums recovered?

Those who have been watching the situation realize that it is due to judicial legislation conceived and given birth over in the big marble palace known as the Supreme Court Building. It is quite evident there is a group over there which thinks that the Congress is either incompetent to legislate, has no inclination to legislate constructively, or does not know what it is about. So they are—I was about to say "sticking their noses into our business," but it would not be proper to refer to the Supreme Court in that way, hence the statement is not made. Let this be said: In their wisdom they tried to, in their polite way, "help us out." Now, this is not the first time they have tried that.

You will recall that some years ago—it was in June of 1934—the Congress passed what it thought was an antiracketeering law. Then you will recall that Dan Tobin's Teamsters Union in New York, and in fact all over this country, began to levy taxes, tribute on every truck that traveled the highway. We thought that was in violation of that statute, but the Supreme Court said "No." In substance, the Court said it was just a sort of playful union activity which the Congress intended to exempt from the practices prohibited by the law.

Far be it from me to criticize a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, but the then Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Stone, did say in his dissenting opinion—315 U. S., page 540—that the reasoning of the majority opinion, if valid—and permit me to quote—"would render common-law robbery an innocent pastime."

He further said—page 541:

> When the Antiracketeering Act was under consideration by Congress, no Member of Congress and no labor leader had the temerity to suggest that such payments, made only to secure immunity from violence and intentionally compelled by assault and battery, could be regarded as the payment of wages by a bona fide employer or that the compulsion of such payments is a legitimate object of a labor union, or was ever made so by any statute of the United States.

Four days after that decision was rendered an amendment was offered by me, striking out the so-called exception upon which the majority hung its opinion.

It took more than 2 years to force through the other body the Hobbs bill which redefined racketeering; which rendered of no effect the decision of the Supreme Court.

It is my hope that the disastrous effects which may follow the Supreme Court's more recent decision in the so-called pottery case may be prevented by the passage of remedial legislation which will leave that august Court no room for superficial—permit me to add, synthetic—reasoning.

In 1938 the Congress passed what is called the Fair Labor Standards Act, and insofar as this discussion is involved, it is but needful to refer to the provisions which fixed minimum wages at 40 cents an hour at the present time and 40 hours a week as the maximum workweek, Congress did not define either "work" or "workweek" as used in the act. But the Labor Department enforcing that law provided rules and regulations which were accepted by employees, by unions, by bargaining representatives of unions and by employers, and there grew up in industry and labor negotiations customs and methods of dealing with overtime and payment for overtime which were accepted and relied upon by all parties primarily interested in wages and hours.

Then along came what we call the portal-to-portal suits instituted to recover wages, instituted by the miners to recover pay for overtime, and we have now two decisions by the Supreme Court with dissenting opinions on the question of what is work and overtime in the coal mines. Those decisions were not so bad because undoubtedly some of the miners were entitled to pay for overtime.

Then we had this pottery case, so-called, up in Mount Clemens, Mich., which came up before Judge Picard in Detroit. I have always heretofore refrained from talking about any case which has not been finally settled. But this situation is something out of the ordinary, its results are so far-reaching that we cannot let it go on unchallenged, because if we do, under that decision of the United States Supreme Court, lawyers, unscrupulous lawyers, crooks, labor racketeers, are inducing and will continue to induce employees, who never had any idea of bringing a suit against an employer for overtime, to file claims in the hope that whether there was or is any justification for those suits, even though there is no foundation for nor hope of recovery, each has a nuisance value, and the employers will be compelled to either pay millions of dollars to avoid expensive lawsuits, to get out of hiring lawyers, and avoid the nuisance of spending their time in court fighting those suits. The Supreme Court, whatever may have been its intention, threw wide open the door to blackmail. And these suits as they are developing, are all too often nothing less than blackmail which is attempted to be levied, not by all employees, because some of these suits are justified, but, as just stated, by labor racketeers and unscrupulous lawyers who are seeking to take advantage of the situation, who are creating bad feeling between employees and their employers; the evil effects will continue for years.

When they started this pottery suit there was only $1,200 involved; that is all. The question was whether the employees should receive pay from the time they arrived at the place where they were going to work, the bench, the machine, and the time they started to work. The master in chancery to whom the case was referred found that the contentions of the employees that such time was work during that extra time and should be paid for as overtime were not sustained.

The master heard the witnesses, he was familiar with the facts, he found in favor of the pottery company on all issues of fact. Then the findings went to Judge Picard and he overruled the master. He also told the company that they would not only pay an attorney fee of $2,000, when the amount involved was only $1,200, but if the litigation was continued on they would have more attorneys' fees to pay.

Then an appeal was taken to the circuit court of appeals, and the circuit court of appeals agreed with the master and disagreed with and overruled the trial judge. Then the case went to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court agreed with the master and with the appellate court as to the findings of fact.

Then what happened? Well, Mr. Justice Murphy—and I think four Justices—Justices Douglas, Reed, Rutledge, and Black agreed with him—thought he would do a little judicial legislation, and he added to the issues and said that one of the questions involved was whether from the time the men punched the time clock, which was 6:46 in the morning and 12:46 at noon, to the time they went to work when the whistle blew, which was 7 o'clock in the morning, 14 minutes later, and 1 o'clock in the afternoon, which was 14 minutes later, they should be paid for that time, and he said sure, if it took them that long to walk over to the place where they were to work, or they were about, as he characterized it, the company's business. He injected that issue.

Under the rules of the Federal court, Judge Picard should have sustained the findings of the master unless he found they were contrary to the evidence. Judge Picard practically admitted that the master had not erred in his decision as to the facts, but nevertheless he used an arbitrary formula of his own and found against the company.

Please do not forget that, in spite of the judge's decision, both the circuit court of appeals and the United States Supreme Court, as just stated, found that the master's findings were in accord with the facts.

And do not forget that the Supreme Court agreed with the circuit court of appeals and reversed Judge Picard. But then, strange as it may seem, sent the case back with instructions to the district judge to determine whether, on two counts, judgment should be found against the company, for the employees, and damages awarded. Neither of these two counts were in the original suit.

The Supreme Court opinion laid down a rule of its own and, it is my understanding, on issues which were not raised in the district court; that is, the trial judge was instructed to find as to how much the company owed for, let us call it, walking time and preliminary activities.

Under what theory, other than that it was at liberty to give us judicial legislation, the Supreme Court took upon itself the function of creating and passing upon new issues, instead of the issues sent to it from the lower court, it is difficult to decide.

Is it possible that the more recently appointed members of that Court are committed to the theory that it is within the province of the Court to decide what the law should be, rather than what it is; that, if, in its opinion, the Congress does not legislate in accordance with what the Court thinks to be for the country's interest, the Court should and will strike down the legislation of the Congress, substitute its own judgment of what is best for the country?

If that is to be the theory from this day on, then we should look into the philosophy—political and economic—of the members of the Court, in order that we may adopt legislation which will unmistakably give to the Court the opinion and views of the Congress, and leave no room for construction.

On that theory, permit me to ask who is Judge Murphy? What are his views as to the rights of organized labor, where there is a dispute between labor and management, and has the public any interest which is to be protected? Judge Murphy is not unknown. He was once Governor of the Philippine Islands. He was called back to the States by the President to become a candidate for Governor of Michigan, and with New Deal support he was elected. That was back in the New Deal days. He is the Governor who, when on the last day of December 1936, the goon squads from Ohio, Toledo, and as far south as Georgia, walked into Michigan and took possession of our factories and the streets of our cities and defied our courts and the court orders. He is the man who called out 3,700 members of the National Guard—to put property owners in possession of their property, to protect the citizen who was walking the streets—to end violence? Oh, no. He called them out and he told them to prevent bloodshed when the sheriff and the local peace officer wanted to enforce the law. He gave them to understand that the sheriff's orders, issued by the court, were not to be enforced. He left the sit-down strikers in possession of private property, of the streets of the cities. He and the troops who were subject to his orders permitted the goon squads to destroy private property, defy the police, and the orders of the courts.

Now he is the man who sits over there and who promulgated this judicial legislation. Under it these suits have started, and they will result, if they keep on, in putting many and many an industry out of business, in cutting off hundreds of thousands of jobs.

The point in all that is this: It is time that this Congress enact legislation to end these ruinous lawsuits. How can we do it? We define the term "work" used in the act. We redefine the workweek. We give the workweek the definition given it by the Labor Department, by the custom which has grown up throughout industry. They have gotten along all right heretofore—the employees, the labor unions, those who have bargained for industry with those who bargain for labor, as to hours and wages. Seldom was there a suit for overtime until Pottery decision came along. Now, if we redefine the workweek, if we redefine workweek in accordance with the custom and methods adopted and used by labor and industry in accord with what Congress meant, much of the trouble will be over.

Do I hear someone say it cannot be done? Oh, yes; it can. The Congress gives and the Congress can take away. So the Supreme Court has said—National Carloading Corp. v. Phoenix-El Paso Express (176 S. W. Reporter 564. Certiorari denied May 22, 1944, 64 U. S. Sup. Ct. Rept. 1156), Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries Co. (251 U. S. 146); Norman v. B. and O. R. R. Co. (294 U. S. 240); Treigle v. Acme Homestead Assn. (297 U. S. 189).

The Congress has authority, if it wishes to exercise it, to deprive the district courts of jurisdiction to hear these suits—Kline v. Burke Construction Co. (260 U. S. 226). Also cases collected in Seligman's, Inc. v. United States (30 Fed. Supp. 895, at p. 900).

It also has power, if it wishes to do so, to enact so-called windfall legislation, which will make these sums which may be recovered if these suits which are filed now succeed, go not into the pockets of these lawyers and the racketeers but go into the United States Treasury as a windfall tax — White Packing Co. v. Robertson (89 Fed. (2d) 775), United States v. Hudson (299 U. S. 498, 57 S. Ct. 309), Wilson Milling Co. v. Commissioner (138 Fed. (2d) 249. Certiorari denied, 320 U. S. 800, 64 S. Ct. 430).

The Congress should not delay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

ANNOUNCEMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MICHENER). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, may I remind the members of the majority party that we will have a conference in this Chamber at 3 o'clock this afternoon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a recent radio speech.

Mr. BEALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCRIVNER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

ON-THE-JOB TRAINING

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, one of the subjects most widely discussed at the national convention of the American Legion at San Francisco was that of the ceilings imposed upon students and trainees taking on-the-job training under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 as amended, ceilings imposed by Public Law No. 679, enacted in the closing days of the Seventy-ninth Congress, a ceiling of $175 on single veterans and $200 on married trainees. On that subject the following report and resolution was adopted by that convention:

ON-THE-JOB TRAINING

Under title II of the Legion's GI bill a method was provided for on-the-job training with a subsistence allowance for veterans seeking improved skills and to those veterans who previously were without employment experience. The tremendous possibility of benefit to the veteran and ultimately to the Nation itself is commonly recognized. Your convention committee reports with sincere regret that in the closing days of the last session of Congress the Veterans' Administration presented to the Congress a measure that did untold harm to the on-the-job-training program. This action was taken by the Veterans' Administration either without their being properly acquainted with the actual facts and the disastrous results that the measure would bring down, or was due to a virtual admission on the part of the Veterans' Administration that despite the powers vested in the Veterans' Administration as provided in the Legion's GI bill the Veterans' Administration was not properly supervising the on-the-job-training program.

The unfortunate publicity that accompanied the passage of this amended bill did untold harm to many thousands of honest employers and the hundreds of thousands of veterans who were receiving the beneficial provisions of these programs. This measure, S. 2477, now Public Law No. 679, was entitled with the disguised designation, "An act to authorize the Veterans' Administration to reimburse State and local agencies for expenses incurred in rendering the services in connection with the administration of certain training programs for veterans and for other purposes."

In addition to performing the function designated in the above title, which is a proper one, the bill as finally drafted by the Veterans' Administration and enacted by Congress set a ceiling of $175 for single men and $200 for married men, including compensation and subsistence, and further limited the course of full-time training to a period of not more than 2 years. This measure was passed by the Congress without hearings being conducted to secure the views of employers, the veterans' organizations, and others interested in this program, and was passed within six legislative days. It is significant that the Legion's GI bill required 6 months from the time of its original drafting to its final enactment by the Congress, with innumerable lengthy public hearings being conducted thereon by both the Senate and House committees. This convention should emphatically protest this hurried action by the Veterans' Administration and the Congress in rushing this important legislation through without conducting proper hearings and predicated upon false assumptions.

The press releases both prior to and subsequent to the enactment of this law by the Veterans' Administration stressed the many flagrant abuses that had arisen in the conduct of on-the-job training programs by unscrupulous employers and gold-brick veterans. The Legion, of course, at no time has condoned any such violations. A survey conducted by the American Legion indicates conclusively that there were no widespread flagrant violations, and whatever improper programs existed, such could have been corrected by the Veterans' Administration without securing additional power.

Twenty-two resolutions protesting the hurried action of Congress in the enactment of Public Law 679 and requesting that the ceiling and training limitations of these provisions of this amended bill be repealed, were received. Your committee recommends that the 23 resolutions, being Nos. 301, 66, 67, 140, 165, 189, 200, 228, 229, 348, 356, 425, 426, 476, 497, 518, 593, 594, 621, 622, 708, 751, be combined in Resolution 301, which is recommended by your committee for adoption, and is as follows:

"Whereas title II of the Legion's GI bill, among other educational benefits, provided for on-the-job training programs with a subsistence allowance so as to afford an opportunity to World War II veterans who entered the armed forces without previous employment and to those seeking a skilled trade or occupation, to improve their future station in life; and

"Whereas on-the-job training programs as contemplated by the American Legion, if properly initiated, approved and supervised, can be of untold material benefit to veterans and to the future well-being of the Nation; and

"Whereas in certain States instances have arisen, due to improper approval and supervision, whereby veterans have been exploited by certain unprincipled employers and such training programs have in some instances been otherwise abused; and

"Whereas the Veterans' Administration caused to be presented to the Seventy-ninth Congress, in the closing days of the second session, S. 2477, a bill entitled 'An act to authorize the Veterans' Administration to reimburse State and local agencies for expenses incurred in rendering services in connection with the administration of certain training programs for veterans and for other purposes,' and hearings were hurriedly conducted in both the Senate and House on said bill without permitting the American Legion or other interested parties or organizations to properly present their views on this important measure or to present their experiences and recommendations of on-the-job training programs; and

"Whereas said act, although disguised by title, among other provisions, unjustly places a ceiling of $175 for single men and $200 for married men, including subsistence, and further limits the course of full-time training to not more than 2 years, and many veterans now pursuing on-the-job training programs, and other veterans who contemplated undertaking such programs, will be denied the full benefits contemplated by the original GI bill in providing for such program: Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled at San Francisco, Septemper 30 to October 4, 1946, That we protest the hurried action of the Veterans' Administration and the Congress in rushing through this important legislation without affording the American Legion and all other interested groups an opportunity to be heard on important measures of this nature, and further submit that many of the abuses found to exist in the administration of on-the-job training programs could have been instantly corrected if such programs had been properly supervised by the Veterans' Administration as contemplated by the Legion's GI bill; and be it further

"Resolved, That we urge the Congress to be called into special session immediately in order to immediately repeal the ceiling limitation provisions of $175 for single men and $200 for married men, and to repeal the 2-year limitation of full-time training as now provided by Public Law 679 (S. 2477)."

As a delegate from Kansas, I was called upon to address the convention upon the circumstances under which this law was enacted. During my remarks, some of which will be repeated in substance here, I stated that one of my first acts would be to introduce legislation designed to remedy this situation.

On Friday, January 3, I introduced a measure now designated as H. R. 145. To fully explain this action, it is necessary to discuss some legislative history so that the memories of Members of the Seventy-ninth Congress may be refreshed and new Members may have these facts to aid them in reaching a decision.

The original law—the Servicemen's Readjustment Act—was enacted in 1944.

In the popular, though erroneous, reference to this measure as the "GI bill of rights," the purpose, the very heart, of the legislation—readjustment—was lost from sight.

The Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, with veterans of both World Wars in its membership, trying to anticipate the problems of 15,000,000 returning servicemen, after weeks of hearings, discussions, study, and conferences with all major veterans' organizations, recommended the Servicemen's Readjustment Act to Congress. Most of its provisions were new—experimental—and were admitted to be such. No other nation had ever undertaken such a program.

Its objective was to assist these veterans, many with as much as 5 years of service, to readjust themselves in a changed civilian world, to help them help themselves prepare for and face their futures and to realize dreams long postponed.

After the Readjustment Act became law, actual experience proved that some changes in it were necessary. Many amendments have been made, more are probably on the way.

Originally, the bill was designed to apply to those young men who had been denied opportunities for training or education because of being called into military service. The act automatically presumed those who entered service at the age of 25 or under had had their training interrupted or delayed. Those over 25 needed only to make a reasonable showing of this interruption. In other words, having deprived them of their opportunities, it was the duty of the Government, as far as possible, to make up to them that lost or delayed opportunity.

One of the many amendments removed these limitations and opened the doors of schools, shops, and stores to all veterans. Another section provided that in the event Congress should enact a measure in the nature of adjusted compensation, benefits paid hereunder would be deducted. That section was later eliminated. The results of that congressional action are self-evident.

Hundreds of thousands of those drafted into the armed forces were men of mature years whose need or desire for training or education was passed. Their need or desire was for a home for their families, or a farm, or a chance to own and operate a business. Guarantee of loans through the Veterans' Administration was at least a partial solution to their problem of readjustment.

Other millions of young Americans, just reaching the age for continuing education or training, were drafted into the armed forces. Their opportunity for more education or training in many lines of endeavor was interrupted and delayed.

How well these veterans have done in our schools is told in the following letter from Prof. J. F. Wellemeyer, dean of Junior College, Kansas City, Kans., a record made by young men I have known since their infancy:

> Knowing your great interest in the welfare of our veterans, I feel that I should write you regarding the great educational program now under way in favor of discharged veterans of World War II. As dean of the Junior College here, I have had a good many veterans on our rolls. We have at present 350 in our Junior College with possibly more to be enrolled the latter part of this week.
> I have been in school administration for a good many years, but I think I have never witnessed a finer attitude on the part of the students than is displayed by these veterans when they return to the classroom. It is perfectly evident that these young men welcome with gratitude the distinction between Army life and school life. In other words, they come to school with a definite purpose in mind. They don't attend college for purely social reasons.
> In my opinion the presence of discharged veterans on our campus raises the level of scholastic attainment very definitely. Even those coming to us directly as high-school graduates are affected by the serious attitude of the veteran. Of all plans for the aid of servicemen in the past two wars, I think you will agree with me that the present plan is by far the most constructive.

That this splendid record is of national scope is demonstrated by a recent article by Dr. Garry C. Myers, part of which follows:

> About three-quarters of a million veterans of World War II are going to college, and at Uncle Sam's expense. Nothing else Congress ever did for war veteran and their country was a wiser service than this. Thanks to the GI bill of rights, some hundreds of thousands of young Americans of ability and ambition are gaining a higher education who otherwise would have been prevented by economic barriers from doing so.
> As I have gone about the Nation and asked high school principals and deans of colleges what kind of a student the average GI is, the answer always has been highly favorable. Most have said he is superior.
> In a recent issue of School and Society, Dr. Raymond Walters, president of Cincinnati University, reports a careful study of veterans' education and the colleges and universities.
> Harvard teachers reported to him that veterans last spring did do superior work, "better than our prewar students."
> University of Texas faculty: "The veterans have done a better scholastic job than the nonveterans."
> University of Utah: "Noticeably superior work."
> University of Wisconsin: "Veterans ahead of nonveterans in five colleges."
> University of Illinois: "Caliber of scholarship of veterans has been extraordinarily good."
> Swarthmore: "Good quality."
> Connecticut: "High grade of work."
> Wesleyan: "Outstanding academic work."
> And so on.
> Dean Walters adds that in the college of law of the University of Cincinnati, veterans now in class are among the best ever to attend this century-old school.

To those of us veterans who entered our schools after World War I, this record of achievement is no surprise.

Many young men never cared to go further than the elementary grades; others became convinced that their future happiness would not be attained with diplomas, but rather with a skill or training not available in schools—learning that could be obtained by doing only—taking on-the-job training.

But whether these youngsters sought readjustment at school or on the job, the United States, through Congress, initially provided subsistence allowances, $50 per month for single men, $75 for married men, to be added to their wages and to help in their support while seeking to fit themselves for the future. Later these amounts were increased to $65 and $90.

In the Army, out of the Army, everywhere we go, there are always some persons not appreciative of a privilege who, not caring what the violation of a privilege may do to someone else, will abuse that privilege. The privilege of subsistence allowances was abused in a few cases, not only by veterans, but by employers who sought by devious means to get Uncle Sam to carry part of the pay roll.

On Monday, July 29, in the last week the Seventy-ninth Congress was in session, too late for hearings to be held, too late for discussion of the merits of any measures on the floor, when no amendments could be offered, General Bradley, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, with two or three of his staff, appeared before a hastily called meeting of the Veterans' Legislative Committee and urged the passage of what is now Public Law No. 679.

The second section of 679 places a ceiling of $175 per month on single veterans and $200 on married veterans in school or taking on-the-job training. This slight difference of $25 seems to indicate that the Veterans' Administration thought that two or more can live almost as cheaply as one.

No actual facts were presented to the committee, no witness other than General Bradley was heard, only three indefinite cases of abuse were mentioned, without details as to persons or places. No information was presented showing upon what facts the $200 ceilings were fixed. No one knew how many veterans would be affected. Personally, I doubt if the general or any or his staff can tell where that figure came from, or what it was based on.

While some persons disagree with my views, I still think this bill, drafted by the Veterans' Administration, became law because General Bradley urged its immediate passage. General Bradley cannot deny his paternity of the legislative child.

My recollection is that I was the only Member to seriously question the general, to object to the measure in committee, and to urge, pending a thorough investigation, a ceiling of not less than $250 for married veterans. However, the measure was reported favorably by the committee in the closing days of the session. The House, on August 1, concurred in previous action of the Senate, and, with the President's signature, Public Law No. 679 became the law of the land.

What happened to the veterans affected by this unexpected action? They were momentarily dazed. They had made their plans for the present and future based on the program authorized by the Readjustment Act. Budgets had to be revised—many had to abandon plans made, plans that were rapidly readjusting them to the changed living conditions they encountered as civilians. Some became bitter, discouraged, and said, "To h—— with it," an attitude which certainly did not aid in their readjustment. Most of them, good citizens as well as good soldiers, buckled their belts tighter, whittled down, kept on, and placed their faith in Congress to remedy the situation and place a reasonable ceiling, if one is found necessary, on incomes, including the subsistence allowance—a ceiling which will enable them to readjust after their arduous and valorous service.

For instance, the Missouri-Pacific Railroad has shops and a roundhouse in Osawatomie, Kans. Ordinarily, 17- and 18-year-old boys of that area enter apprentice training. The war stopped that. When they were again in a position to think about apprentice training they were mature men—22, 23, 24, or 25, married, and with families. With the subsistence allowance and the apprentice pay which calls for automatic increases each 6 months, they were earning from $225 to $235. New civilian clothes were needed, housing shortages made the purchase of a home necessary, furniture to reestablish housekeeping was a "must" item. Not luxurious homes, but they and their families, again united, were happy. They were willing workers, eager learners. Their progress was good. The railroad officials told me they were the best group ever entered in the training. Everyone was profiting—future emergencies would find us with more trained men. Without the subsistence allowance these men, family men, could not have undertaken this training at the starting wage, less in many cases than their Army pay.

Then came Public Law No. 679.

Retrenchment—to the tune of $25 or $35 per month—not much, but with increased living costs, extra expenditures not required by those who stayed home, it was a tough $25 or $35 to do without. In fact, it was a little more than $25 or $35, because from that portion there was no income- or social security-tax deduction.

Undoubtedly, a thorough investigation will disclose many newly returned veterans lost all hope for the future—lost their homes, furniture, cars—due to this hastily enacted, ill-advised legislation.

H. R. 145 reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso limiting the total of subsistence allowance plus compensation payable to veterans in training programs, paragraph 6 of part VIII of Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), as amended by section 2 of Public Law No. 679, Seventy-ninth Congress, is hereby repealed, effective from the date of the approval of this act.

While its purpose is declared to be the outright appeal, my main objective is to bring the subject before the Nation, Congress generally, and the Committee on Veterans' Affairs particularly, so that—with time available—a thorough study can be made of on-the-job training in all its phases—and particularly as it relates to these arbitrarily fixed ceilings.

Then, a full hearing had, with witnesses from the Veterans' Administration, veterans' organizations, and affected veterans themselves, if ceilings are found to be necessary, those that are reasonable, those that will aid and not hinder the readjustment of veterans, may be adopted.

This is but one of the many matters relating to veterans which you will face in the Eightieth Congress, but I am sure that they can be better solved if you will but hold in mind, and so refer to it, that the law discussed during this period is the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944.

At the time I introduced H. R. 145 I also placed in the hopper H. R. 144, designed to repeal Public Law No. 679 in its entirety—so that study can be made of its other provisions.

At some future time I hope to be able to discuss with you other phases of Public Law No. 679 which need thorough research and study—such as the first portion, which provides for reimbursement of the States for money spent in their part of on-the-job training program, a situation which is also subject to abuse. Another portion of Public Law No. 679 needing a full airing which it did not get is the one limiting on-the-job training to 2 years, placing restrictions on employers, providing burdensome requirements which have discouraged many employers and veterans and have again brought to business institutions of America a flock of investigators and supervisors—bureaucrats, if you please—just when it was the universal desire to rid ourselves of this plague.

Sound judgment, not sentiment, will be required in consideration of this and other measures relating to veterans.

With so many veterans of World War II coming into this Congress I am sure their advice on these matters so close to them and the men they served with will greatly contribute to constructive, helpful, and sound legislation.

In closing, I wish to call your attention to an article in the Washington Times-Herald of yesterday, Sunday, January 12, by Tyrell W. Krum, a veteran of World Wars I and II, who, since his discharge from service, has edited a daily column entitled "Veterans' Affairs." Mr. Krum has keen insight and a sound understanding of the problems veterans face.

The article follows:

One of the very first chores which the new Republican House and Senate should undertake—so far as the broad field of veterans' affairs is concerned—is to immediately straighten out the GI training-on-the-job mess inherited from the Democratic-controlled Seventy-ninth Congress.

It will be recalled that during the closing days of the last session, a measure known as Public Law 679 was quietly railroaded through both Chambers as an amendment to the GI bill of rights, placing a ceiling on the total amount of wages and Government subsistence which veterans might receive while undergoing job training to better enmesh themselves into civilian life.

The whole deal was concluded with such secrecy and stealth that not even the closest observers on Capitol Hill, including legislative representatives of the major old-line veterans' organizations, knew about it until the act was signed by the President at the White House on August 8.

However, the Veterans' Administration later admitted it had sponsored the measure and pushed it through to final adoption. The fact there was no advance notice given the public, that the usual open hearings were not held, and that the measure was sneaked along through resort to the unanimous-consent legislative device indicates clearly the depths to which the VA palace guard stooped in bulldogging the measure through the Congress, which is supposed to protect the rights of all the people.

It's up to the new Congress to act immediately to alleviate the damage already inflicted on the morale and spirits of hundreds of thousands of American veterans who entered training-on-the-job programs with high hopes and sincere good faith only to receive the bitterest kick in the teeth administered any veterans of America's armed forces down through all the years.

We want to emphasize that the fault definitely does not rest with General Bradley, because if he had his way, I know he'd order the whole thing held in abeyance. But he's bound by the law of the land and must await congressional action before he can move.

Therefore, we respectfully and strongly urge Congress to immediately abolish the $200 ceiling by joint resolution and direct the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs to launch a formal investigation to determine the proper path to pursue in the future.

Furthermore, pending establishment of a definite policy on training on the job, we urge General Bradley to resume paying all qualified veteran job trainees their full subsistence, in addition to any and all wages received on the job.

And, finally, that all demands by the Veterans' Administration for refunds for overpayments so far made to trainees be immediately rescinded and the thousands of checks now held up by the Treasury be released at once.

Because, we want to point out, a half million or more war veterans, as well as members of their families, are burned up at what they call the "lousy deal" they've been handed and are looking to Congress to come to their rescue.

I know of actual cases in which veterans and their families are about to be evicted from their homes because of the hardships worked on them by the Veterans' Administration "palace guard" in its inane and stupid handling of the situation during the past 5 months.

There are many new Members of the Congress—a lot of them World War II veterans, themselves—who may not have the complete background picture on what has happened up to date. We think they should know full well just how fouled up the whole training-on-the-job program really is at this stage of the game so they can do something about it forthwith.

We shall present all the facts in this space during the next few days, and we hope all you Representatives and Senators will follow them.

(Mr. SCRIVNER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a resolution of the American Legion, parts of two letters, and some newspaper articles.)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANDERSON of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include certain resolutions.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] has time to address the House at this moment, but he agreed that I could take some time if I could get the consent of the House. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] has a special order for 10 minutes. If there is no objection, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] may proceed for 5 minutes at this time.

VETERANS' LEGISLATION

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, I was chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation when the bill to which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCRIVNER] has just referred was passed.

May I take this occasion to say that I doubt that we have ever had a public servant since I have been in Congress who was more conscientious and more able in the discharge of his duties than Gen. Omar Bradley, the present head of the Veterans' Administration. He came to the committee and said that there were many abuses of the law and asked for the passage of this curtailment. The matter was laid before the committee, of which the gentleman from Kansas was a member, and a bill was passed out, if I remember correctly, unanimously.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SCRIVNER. It was not passed out unanimously because I did not approve the legislation.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Kansas did not call for a roll-call vote in the committee.

Mr. SCRIVNER. That is right.

Mr. RANKIN. He did not oppose it on the floor of the House when it was passed by unanimous consent.

There are a great many phases of this proposition that will be gone into, and I hope the gentleman from Kansas will remain a member of the Committee on Veterans' Legislation. I have been a member of that committee since it was created. I have probably taken more criticism on account of veterans' legislation than any other man who ever served in Congress. I opposed the administration when the economy bill was put through, which injured and probably cost the lives of many tubercular men whose very existence was hanging on by a thread.

From that day to this I have endeavored to get those benefits back that were taken away. I have put the interests of the disabled men first in my service on that committee.

The Veterans' Administration came to us and said that in some places a racket was being carried on and that if certain changes were not made there would be a Nation-wide scandal. General Bradley came before the committee. We laid the measure before the committee, and it was passed out. The gentleman from Kansas, if he had wanted to, could have called for a roll call, and the chairman would have granted the request. The bill came to the floor of the House and was passed by unanimous consent. If I remember correctly, it was passed in the Senate in the same way.

It may be that some changes are necessary to be made, but do not forget that there are untold millions of servicemen who are getting nothing, there are untold millons of servicemen who went back to their old jobs, who went back to the farm, to the factory, and to the store and did not ask for unemployment pay, but they are today serving this country and helping to pay the taxes to carry on this program.

They, too, must be considered. I spoke at the University of Mississippi the other night. There were about 900 of these ex-service boys there. I heard little or no complaint; probably one or two. But I never saw a more alert set of young men in my life. They were more alert, in my opinion, than the young men were when I was in college there many years ago, because they had been through the service. They were hard students. The chancelor told me they were among the best students in the college. What I am after is to give them every opportunity, and if theer is any change necessary in this law I shall certainly go along with it.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SCRIVNER. In connection with my remarks there will be inserted excerpts from letters and articles pointing out that the record these men have made that the gentleman has mentioned is universal; that they are the tops of the students in the schools throughout the country.

Mr. RANKIN. I think the gentleman is right, and I for one do not want to hamper them in preparing themselves for the great battle of life that lies before them. I am willing to support any reasonable amendment, but I do not want us to overlook the fact that there are untold millions of servicemen who have not asked for a penny to go to school, who have not asked for a penny of unemployment compensation, but who are just as much entitled to our consideration as any one else.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. SCRIVNER. If the gentleman will recall, there was a section in the original act known as section 1505 which had in mind just exactly the kind of men that the gentleman is talking about, which provided that in case there was a law in the nature of adjusted compensation the benefits that those other men received would be deducted; as we called it, the equalization section.

Mr. RANKIN. That is right. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that when this matter was first brought to our committee, the original bill did not have any on-the-job-training provision in it at all. I insisted that we ought to provide for these trainees, and we inserted a provision for that purpose.

We want to see that the veterans get the full benefit of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

THE WORK OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON POSTWAR ECONOMIC POLICY AND PLANNING

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, the Special Committee on Postwar Economic Policy and Planning, of which I have had the honor to be chairman, was established by the Seventy-eighth Congress to investigate and report upon all matters relating to postwar economic policy and problems. The committee was continued by the Seventy-ninth Congress and completed its work last month. Based upon extensive hearings and exhaustive studies, 11 reports and several supplements have been issued dealing with various phases of the country's economy. Each report contained specific recommendations to Congress. In the final report—the eleventh—and the supplement thereto, of the Postwar Economic Policy and Planning Committee, copies of which were sent to each Member of Congress in December last, a summary of the work, the problems, and the recommendations of that committee was made. Since some of these recommendations require further action by the Congress, I should like to make some comments at this time which I think are pertinent and seasonable. I should like particularly to request the membership of the Congress to compare carefully the views there expressed and unanimously approved by the members of the committee with the report just issued by the President's Council of Economic Advisers; the report of that body is now awaiting action by the Joint Legislative Committee on the Economic Report, which was authorized by the last Congress. I make bold to suggest to the joint committee that the thorough and detailed study of the present state of this Nation's economy at home and abroad prepared by the staff, and analyzed and approved by our committee, will prove most useful in dealing with the President's Economic Report. The time for setting up this new joint committee and then having that committee report to the Congress on the report itself, which has just been laid before Congress by the Council of Economic Advisers, is set by statute as February 1, 1947. That does not afford much time for thorough study of some very difficult problems about which Congress will have to be advised in the consideration of the economic report.

May I respectfully suggest to the members of the new joint committee that the 3 years of hard work put in by the House Special Committee on Postwar Economic Policy are in a measure brought to fruition in the eleventh report and supplement. I believe this final report, in the section that deals currently with the same material dealt with in the President's Economic Council's report, may readily serve the new committee, because of the unanimity expressed in the eleventh report, without regard to party, as a fine basis for judging and acting upon the Economic Report.

I wish to take this opportunity to present to the Congress a brief summary of the work done by the committee and of the recommendations relating to the economic problems which still face us.

CONTRACT TERMINATION AND SETTLEMENT

Because of its importance to a speedy reconversion, the first problem studied by the committee was the settlement of terminated war contracts. Legislation recommended by the committee was enacted with only minor changes. Accomplishments under the legislation have been extremely gratifying and the objectives set by Congress have been reached. In sharp contrast to the long-drawn-out and much criticized procedure after World War I, one year after VJ-day contract settlement was 98 percent completed. Congress is to be commended for the passage of this legislation well in advance of the end of the war and the events fully justified its action. The Office of Contract Settlement is likewise to be commended for the efficiency of its entire operation. The speed with which the claims were settled, payments made to the contractors, and plants cleared of Government property undoubtedly played an important part in the quick reconversion of industry and the avoidance of an immediate postwar slump in employment and production.

SURPLUS PROPERTY

The second problem studied was the disposal of surplus property and plants, which the committee foresaw as being an extremely important and difficult task. After thorough study the committee recommended legislation which it considered necessary for the expeditious disposal of surpluses. The House passed a bill which substantially embraced the recommendations of the committee and under which certain broad policies and standards were set up by Congress with the details left to the discretion of an administrator. The bill, however, was so changed in the Senate and in conference that it was unacceptable to the committee as finally enacted. And, notwithstanding, the fact that the House bill bore my name, I announced to the House when the bill came back from the Senate that it would prove unsatisfactory and unworkable, and I personally voted against it.

Progress in the disposal of war surpluses under the act has been slow and disappointing. The difficulty of the task is increased by the fact that the large quantities of varied surpluses must be disposed of with a minimum of dislocation to the economy.

After experience with the Board which was set up under the original act, legislation was enacted which carried out the recommendation of the committee for a single administrator, but most of the other defects remain. Congress must accept full responsibility for the unsound provisions in this legislation and, in great part, for the delays caused by conflicting and unworkable priorities and preferences granted under it.

The committee still feels its original recommendations were sound and to meet the present current situation it recommends that: First, the Surplus Property Act of 1944 be simplified; second, that recognition be given to the urgency for speed in disposing of surplus goods while the current sellers' market exists; third, that the owning agencies declare their surpluses to the War Assets Administration immediately; and, fourth, that the property now owned by the various agencies be surveyed by the executive department to expedite the declaration of surpluses.

MACHINERY OF GOVERNMENT

The committee prepared the legislation which established the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion. The purpose of this Office was to integrate the policies of the many governmental departments which would be concerned with the problem of successful demobilization of returning servicemen and war workers and their speedy reabsorption into peacetime work. While the committee feels that this Office has not adequately fulfilled all the functions which were originally intended, the experience does indicate the need for the continuation of a Presidential agency to act as a sort of over-all general staff to coordinate the formulation and execution of policy.

The committee also recommends that the Joint Congressional Committee on the Economic Report of the President should either be broadened in its functions to cover all governmental economic policy or that a permanent committee should be established in each House with the mandate to continue the type of work done by the Special Committee on Postwar Economic Policy and Planning. There is at present a lack of legislative vehicles for taking over-all views of policy, particularly in the economic field.

It is recommended that a study be made by such an over-all joint committee on economic policy into the effect of military expenditures and occupation policies on the total economic and fiscal problems of the Government. The committee also feels that consideration should be given to an immediate setting up of a War Resources Board to insure civilian control of the economy in wartime. Such a board would have a skeleton personnel and an adequate reserve subject to immediate call on the same basis as a military reserve.

EMPLOYMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT

Due to no small extent to the advance action taken by both business and Government on a wide front, demobilization of the armed forces and civilian workers, and reconversion have been carried out with much less shock to our economy and with much less unemployment than was generally expected. On the other hand, the adjustment of wages and working conditions to the postwar economy has been accompanied by an increase in strikes. The committee has not analyzed specific legislation with respect to labor relations, but it feels that corrective legislation is needed. It recommends that prompt action be taken by Congress so that sound, constructive—not punitive—legislation may result.

The committee felt that unemployment compensation is one of the most important measures to minimize the effects of a decline in employment and in September 1944 recommended to the State authorities that they give immediate consideration to improving the State laws by increasing the duration and the level of benefits. At the same time it recommended that the Federal Government set up a loan fund from which advances could be made to the States to protect their funds against the threat of depletion. Such action was taken by Congress, and the committee was also pleased that the great majority of States have liberalized their benefits both in amount and duration. The committee also recommended that unemployment compensation be extended to groups not then covered, particularly the employees of small firms. Some action has been taken in this direction but not in all the States. There is now available in the State unemployment-compensation funds about $7,000,000,000, which would seem to be adequate to meet demands for benefits to those becoming unemployed.

Favorable action was also taken by Congress on the committee's recommendation that credit be given under the Federal old-age-insurance plan for service in the armed forces. The committee in 1944 recommended that the question of financing the old-age-insurance plan should be studied carefully in relation to the general fiscal problems of the Government. The Ways and Means Committee has made such a study and submitted a report, but no action has been taken. The committee recommends that this study be continued and that a definite financial program be submitted to Congress. No action has yet been taken on the committee's recommendation that many of the groups not now covered under the old-age-insurance plan should be brought into the system.

PUBLIC WORKS AND CONSTRUCTION

In a report issued in July 1945 the committee made a number of recommendations with respect to the stabilization of the construction industry in the postwar period. It forecast a large demand for private construction during the first postwar year after the war. It therefore recommended that public construction be limited during this period of active private construction to projects of immediate necessity, but that at the same time plans and specifications be drawn up in advance by public agencies so that public programs could be expanded when private ones slackened. Congress, on the committee's recommendation, appropriated $65,000,000 for advances to State and local governments for the preparation of drawings and specifications. The committee was gratified with the progress made in this program. Private construction has been very active, with contracts ahead of the capacity of the industry. Public agencies have been cautious in letting contracts and public construction has been kept at a low level. The committee in its final report recommended that public construction still be limited to projects of immediate necessity while work should be continued on plans for useful public works of less immediate urgency.

Good progress has been made by the States and local governments in preparing plans and specifications; the advances for this work have exhausted the $65,000,000 appropriation. The committee recommends that the balance of the $150,000,000 originally recommended be appropriated for this purpose. Funds will also be needed by the Federal governmental agencies to prepare the plans and specifications for projects already authorized by Congress.

The committee also recommended previously that machinery should be set up to coordinate the construction policies of the various agencies of the Federal Government and, in turn, to coordinate these policies with those of the State and local governments and with private industry. The Council of Economic Advisers would seem to have the authority needed to set up the machinery, and steps to this end should be taken at once.

The committee was pleased that many of the controls to which it called attention in the eleventh report as causing delays in construction have now been eliminated.

FEDERAL BUDGET AND TAX POLICY

The committee in its fourth report, issued in September 1944, stated that the postwar national fiscal policy should be aimed at an orderly reduction of the national debt and that the starting point of such a program must be a firm determination to hold Federal expenditures down to a minimum consistent with proper functioning of the Government. The committee was disappointed that greater progress has not been made toward reducing expenditures and balancing the budget for the current fiscal year.

Under present conditions the prime concern should be the balancing of the budget and the creation of a surplus in order to reduce the inflationary forces. The committee feels that expenditures can be reduced, without interfering with national defense or the normal functions of the Government, to a level which would permit a substantial surplus for the next fiscal year and also a reduction in Federal taxes from the present high level.

The committee recommended that a tax system should be developed which would raise the necessary revenue and still distribute the tax burden in a manner that will provide adequate incentives for venture capital, creative effort, and business growth, and also permit expansion in consumer demand.

The committee in 1944 recommended that the excess-profits tax be repealed soon after the end of the war, as was done.

The committee also recommended and still feels that future issues of State and local governments be made taxable and that consideration be given to elimination of double taxation of dividends, that averaging of incomes for tax purposes be permitted, and that excise taxes should be kept to a minimum.

MONETARY AND FINANCIAL PROBLEMS

In a report issued in March 1946 the committee pointed out that strong fiscal and monetary measures were necessary to effect control over inflationary forces. Among other measures which it recommended were curtailment of Federal expenditures, balancing of the budget, limiting of current expenditures for public works, and the institution of campaigns to urge individuals to increase or maintain their holdings of Government securities. Progress has been made in all these directions but much yet remains to be done.

There have been further additions since the end of the war to the large liquid savings in the hands of the public. Purchasing power is at an unprecedented level and could be exerted to push prices higher. It is thus necessary that moderation be shown by all groups in order to check the threat to a continued inflationary trend—by consumers in spending, by labor in wage demands, by business in pricing policies, by government in its own spending, tax, and monetary policies.

WARTIME CONTROLS

In its fourth report, issued in the fall of 1944, the committee recommended that the objective of the Government should be to release wartime controls at the earliest practicable moment after the end of the war. In line with this policy the committee prepared and submitted to Congress in March 1946 a carefully developed program for the gradual and orderly elimination of wartime controls. This program was adopted only in small part. Unfortunately the absence of all controls for a period last summer and the final enactment of make-shift legislation resulted in considerable confusion to the economy, some of which could probably have been avoided if a plan such as the committee recommended had been adopted. The committee in its final report recommended the continuation of only a very limited number of controls for a few months to meet certain situations in which shortages still exist, as the committee feels that the balance of the anti-inflationary fight must now be waged with general fiscal and monetary policies.

AGRICULTURE

In a report issued in August 1946 the committee proposed a long-range postwar agricultural policy to Congress which it had developed after a long period of study and consultation with the various farm groups. At the same time the committee expressed itself in favor of the price support guaranties provided in the Steagall Act. Just before the end of 1946 action was taken in declaring the end of the national emergency, as the committee had recommended. During the 2-year period which now remains for the price support, the committee recommends that a study should be made of the parity concepts in two respects: First, relative levels of comparative prices between one commodity and another and, second, the validity of the general level of all agricultural prices as defined in terms of the 1910–14 parity base. Study should be conducted and legislation prepared prior to the end of the Steagall period so that farmers will not be called upon to make their plans in the dark.

The committee would call particular attention to the recommendations for a solution of long-range agricultural problems as contained in its tenth report, the objective of these recommendations being the achievement of a high level of stable income for farmers over the years.

FOREIGN POSTWAR ECONOMIC POLICY

In 1945 the committee issued a comprehensive survey of the foreign economic policy of the United States and made a number of general and specific recommendations for the postwar period. The report received extremely favorable comments from the press, the New York Times, for instance, calling it "one of the most carefully thought-out and balanced sets of recommendations to come out of any congressional committee in recent years," and the Washington Post calling it "a highly valuable document."

The committee was pleased that a number of recommendations which it made at that time have since been carried out.

First. The proposals made by the committee for developing a freer private trade and breaking down the increasing bilateralism of international trade were accepted in general without significant change in policy objectives in the terms of the American trade proposals issued by the State Department.

Second. The committee proposed that an international conference be called to consider the problem of a general reduction in trade barriers throughout the world. A meeting of representatives from 16 countries has just been held in London to prepare for such a general conference and the establishment of the International Trade Organization.

Third. The committee proposed the reduction of trade barriers by trade agreements with individual countries under a strengthened Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Progress has been made by renewing this act for a period of 3 years, with greater latitude being given to the executive department.

Fourth. The committee pointed out the necessity of freeing our postwar international monetary system from restrictive controls. The International Monetary Fund has been established for this purpose and now has a membership of 39 countries.

Fifth. The committee recommended the establishment of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and that the resources of the Export-Import Bank be increased. Both of these recommendations were adopted.

Sixth. The committee in a later report recommended that certain conditions should be incorporated in any proposed loan made to Great Britain; the agreement finally reached contained a large proportion of these conditions.

While these developments are hopeful indications of the future course of world trade, the committee in its final report pointed out that serious obstacles are yet to be overcome if a system of unrestricted multilateral trade envisaged by the committee is to become a reality. It also reiterated the statement made in its previous report that "high levels of output and employment at home are an essential requirement for expanding world trade."

The committee is pleased that action was taken by Congress in carrying out its recommendation that the Foreign Service of this country be made more attractive as a career, but feels that further action is necessary to recruit and maintain the highest class of representatives abroad.

ECONOMIC RECONSTRUCTION OF EUROPE

Based upon the visit of seven members to the principal countries of Europe and the Middle East, the committee in November 1945 presented a report on the economic reconstruction of Europe. In this report the committee made specific recommendations on the immediate economic problems then facing Europe, such as transportation, fuel, raw materials, communications, relief, and finances. In addition it made recommendations regarding our relations with the United Kingdom, with Russia, and the reconstruction of Germany. Many of the specific recommendations contained in the committee's report have now become a part of American foreign policy and have helped to restore the economy of the world along the lines of its previous report on foreign economic policy.

In a supplementary report to its eleventh report, released on December 30 last, the committee surveyed the progress made during the past year in European economic reconstruction. I would particularly call this report to your attention as Congress will soon be called upon to take action on many of the problems discussed in this report.

Time will not permit me to comment on the specific recommendations, but I would like to mention the general recommendations of the committee in regard to our relations with Russia and the reconstruction of Germany.

There has been criticism of the supplementary report from certain left-wing groups, as was to be expected. They seem to be trying to build up a smoke screen by distorting our recommendations regarding Germany in order to detract attention from some of the points brought out in regard to Russia.

RUSSIA

On the committee's return from its mission to Europe in the fall of 1945, it strongly recommended to the administration an abandonment of the appeasement policy toward Russia. The committee feels, as stated in its final report, that it can take justifiable pride in the fact that its recommendations have been largely followed. It is more convinced than ever, in the light of subsequent events, that a firm policy in dealing with that country is imperative.

The committee in its eighth report called attention to the economic possibilities for extensive trade between this country and Russia but that the realization of these possibilities would depend upon the active cooperation of the two countries. When Russia demonstrates a willingness to keep its war promises and postwar settlements, then economic cooperation becomes reasonable and proper.

The committee in its final report submits for consideration by Congress a proposal that, until Russia meets its political obligations and accepts full and effective international control of atomic energy, there should be a limitation in shipments of certain products of special military and economic character and that control also be established over the furnishing of technical know-how. The committee also recommends that appropriate control be established over the export of American processes, technical know-how, and products to all state trading countries.

GERMANY

The committee feels, as it stated in its final report, that our objective for administering the economic affairs of Germany is to make that country self-sustaining without at the same time permitting it again to threaten the peace of the world. This goal cannot be obtained without Russian, British, and French cooperation. With the stripping of German industries for war-making purposes having already been carried out, if the proper system of inspection and the proper control of imports of strategic materials are inaugurated, there is little possibility of Germany again building up a war machine.

The committee has previously pointed out the dependence of the industries of the other European countries upon German raw materials and German manufactures and if we went beyond the limits of destroying the war-making power of Germany and prevented production in the ordinary industries, the effect would be to depress the whole standard of living of Europe. At the same time the burden of relief, in addition to heavier occupation costs, would be imposed indefinitely upon the Western Powers, principally the United States, if widespread disease and unrest were to be avoided in Europe.

The committee pointed out that the key to most of the problems lay in our ability to get the occupation Allies to carry out the Potsdam declaration that "during the period of occupation Germany should be treated as an economic unit." If real cooperation toward this end had been possible, expenditures for relief and the necessity for loans for raw materials might have been greatly reduced by the increased ability of Germany to feed its own population and to build up production and exports with which to pay for its necessary imports.

In its final report the committee recommended to Congress immediate hearings on the whole problem of the financial obligations which the United States is bearing under its occupation policy, with a view to substituting productive and self-supporting economies in the ex-enemy countries under our control for the present method of paying reparations, in effect, out of the pockets of the American taxpayers. Unless such a policy is adopted, once more we shall pay a major part of German reparations, this time not by private income but by occupation costs and relief for western Germany.

My committee's report called for further study of seven other important matters that fall within the jurisdiction of standing committees of Congress, which may be found summarized on pages 12–13 of the supplement to our eleventh report. These require further action, we think, by the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I would like to take this opportunity to express my deep appreciation and sincere thanks to the members of the House Committee on Postwar Economic Policy and Planning. They are Messrs. Cooper, of Tennessee; Walter, of Pennsylvania; Zimmerman, of Missouri; Voorhis, of California; Murdock, of Arizona; Lynch, of New York; O'Brien, of Illinois; Fogarty, of Rhode Island; Worley, of Texas; Gifford, of Massachusetts; Welch, of California; Wolverton, of New Jersey; Hope, of Kansas; Wolcott, of Michigan; LeFevre, of New York; and Simpson, of Illinois. Together with former Representatives Fish, of New York; Dewey, of Illinois; and Reece, of Tennessee, who retired from Congress, and Mr. Thomason, of Texas, who was forced to leave the committee due to other important assignments, these gentlemen have made up the personnel of the committee during its existence. They have labored long, earnestly, patriotically and without regard to party affiliation in the task assigned them of making the necessary study and recommendations to the Congress and the country, to achieve the goal of converting our wartime economy to a peacetime economy with as little friction as possible. I doubt if any select or standing committee of the Congress has ever worked together more harmoniously or has issued as many unanimous reports as has this committee. I deem it a great honor and high privilege, Mr. Speaker, to have served as its chairman.

Any statement about the accomplishments of this committee could not be complete unless it was frankly stated that a considerable measure of this unanimity was a result of the high level of ability, devotion to the public interest, and objectivity of our staff director, Mr. Marion B. Folsom. The confidence which he inspired in the committee and in the country is a monument to his ability, patriotism, and sincerity. I believe also that his consultants were the reflection of his high devotion to his country.

I would like to express the committee's gratification for the cooperation it has received from the leadership, the standing committees of the House, and in general for the action which has been taken by the Congress upon its recommendations.

Moreover, the committee takes pride in the fact that it has practiced its recommended policy of economy in government by conducting its activities during the past 3 years within the appropriation which was granted to the committee for 1 year with a substantial balance from the original appropriation being returned upon completion of its work. I believe that, too, is a unique record.

The committee does not recommend that it be continued in the present Congress, as it was established to consider the economic problems of the reconversion period, which is now practically over. It would strongly urge, however, that serious consideration be given by Congress to the several recommendations relating to current problems, which were presented in its final report. As stated above it also urges that a permanent committee on economic policy be established to continue the type of work of the special committee, or that the functions of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report of the President be broadened to cover all phases of economic policy.

In the past, under the American competitive enterprise system, wages and the standard of living have steadily advanced over the years because of the increase in productivity and reached a level not remotely approached by any other system.

May I quote the following concluding paragraphs from the committee's final report:

The individual freedoms enjoyed by all groups of producers, both management and labor, and by the ordinary citizen in every walk of life have, in spite of defects under the system, unleashed the creative powers of human initiative and enterprise to accomplish these unparalleled results.

Confidence in this free system, derived from its accomplishments and its prospects, is the basis for the committee's recommendations on economic policies. With the excellent record achieved in reaching the present high level of employment, with the backlog of demand for many products still unsatisfied, and with the unprecedented amount of liquid savings in the hands of the consuming public, the committee feels that we have the basic conditions for maintaining a high level of both production and employment. A start has been made toward this goal. The task ahead is to develop economic conditions which will encourage stability of productive employment at a high level.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most merciful Father, our times are in Thine hands and we trust that gratitude is in our hearts. We pray for the directive force of Thy wisdom, that through invigorated understanding we may have clearer discernment in the solution of all problems. As ours is a moral duty which no one can ignore and no individual can evade, let our names be on the rolls of those who, in every age, have wrought righteousness and slain wickedness. In the volume of our labors, let our courage of faith and devotion to human liberty be recorded.

Give Thy gracious blessing unto our Speaker and our leaders; may all their decisions spring from balanced judgments and a genuine sympathy for the needs of our country. In the Master's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Committee on Ways and Means: Noah M. Mason, Illinois; Thomas E. Martin, Iowa; Robert A. Grant, Indiana; Hal Holmes, Washington; Hubert S. Ellis, West Virginia; John W. Byrnes, Wisconsin.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE MAJORITY WHIP

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to announce the unanimous selection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS] for the position of majority whip of the House of Representatives, one of the most important positions in our organization. The gentleman from Illinois came here at the same time I did. It has been a great pleasure to serve with him and to work with him. He has brought to his job here the most conscientious and honest consideration of all the problems coming before the Congress. In his term as whip of the minority he operated efficiently and well. He saw to it that as far as it was within his power the Members on our side knew and were well acquainted with the issues coming before the House, and he has continuously cooperated with the leadership in helping to bring about the presence of Members on the floor at times when matters of consequence were under consideration. So I am sure everyone will join with me in extending to him our best wishes for a successful term as majority whip.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this time in order to acquaint the House, particularly the Democratic Members, with the fact that the Democratic committee on committees has completed its work and is ready to report tomorrow. At 11:30 a. m. there will be a caucus of the Democrats on the floor of the House, and I hope that shortly thereafter we will be prepared to present our committee assignments to the House.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORAND. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. It was suggested the other day that we hope to adjourn over tomorrow until Thursday. Will that interfere with the gentleman's plans? I take it if the conference is not to be until 11:30 you will not be ready with your resolution tomorrow anyway?

Mr. FORAND. We had understood that the gentleman from Indiana had made the announcement last week that there would be no session on Wednesday. We want to be doubly sure that on Thursday we can present to you our list of assignments.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

[Mr. HINSHAW addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a short editorial from a national magazine.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a news article.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, I obtained permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD on the subject Year of Decision. I am informed by the Public Printer that this will exceed two pages of the RECORD and will cost $140, but I ask that it be printed notwithstanding that fact.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

Mr. FOOTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by the Honorable John Q. Tilson, of New Haven, Conn., a distinguished member of this House for 22 years and for 6 years the majority floor leader of the House, speaking before the Graduates Club of New Haven, Conn., on December 4, 1946.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next after disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and at the conclusion of any special orders heretofore entered I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

WHO DESERVES CONSIDERATION UNDER PORTAL-TO-PORTAL THEORY?

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the membership of the House to an editorial that today I am inserting in the RECORD. This editorial was written by Mr. George Kochendefer, of the Mansfield News-Journal. Mr. Kochendefer is one of the outstanding editorial writers of the country and this one brings up a new phase on the portal-to-portal pay controversy.

Mr. Speaker, at a future date I would like to have some of those individuals who believe in this portal-to-portal pay theory answer the question raised in this editorial. If portal-to-portal pay is to be given to the workers in industry during the war period, why not give it to those of our armed forces?

Mr. Speaker, the editorial to which I refer follows:

VETERANS ALSO DESERVE CONSIDERATION UNDER PORTAL-TO-PORTAL PAY THEORY

Whether seriously, or with a touch of grim humor, some of the veterans of World War II are presenting the thought that if portal-to-portal back pay is to be granted to industrial employees, to the extent of billions of dollars, the same principle should be applied to returned veterans and men still in military service.

It is even being suggested that various veterans' organizations—the American Legion, VFW, Amvets, AVC, DAV, and others—may have thus far been rather negligent in failing to retain a flock of lawyers to build up a case based on the portal-to-portal theory, including, of course, a claim for compensation equal to that paid industrial workers during the war.

Recognizing the importance of war work, it is difficult for many veterans to see why such relatively safe work at home was worth more—in money—than the military service they performed, at the risk of their lives and under conditions which sometimes involved great hardships and extreme discomfort.

And they remember that they were doing all this for less pay per month than some war workers were getting per day.

Also keenly in mind are the many returned veterans who are in hospitals, destined to endure years of suffering—and others who lost an arm or a leg, even an occasional one with both legs and arms amputated. What is to be the fair compensation for such as these, if their fellow-workers who stayed safely at home are to receive extra pay for work they didn't do?

One writer on this subject puts it: "The guys overseas felt that war workers had as much of a duty to perform as the soldiers did; that they should work overtime, or all night, if necessary, and not stick up the taxpayers for it. The soldiers did not get paid for extra guard duty, or for nights spent in bomb shelters, or traveling all night in truck convoys."

There will be a rejoinder, of course, that military service is "a patriotic duty," that the great debt of gratitude to veterans "can never be paid"—but what greater obligation rests upon one American than another in time of war—and why should the producers of munitions and other war supplies be more highly paid or live more comfortably than those who did the actual fighting, suffering, and dying?

It will be said, also, that it would be financially ruinous to attempt to equalize the "back pay" for veterans with that of factory workers during the war—but would that idea be any more fantastic than the demands for billions of dollars in portal-to-portal pay now being made by various union labor organizations?

Yes; it would take many billions of dollars, maybe hundreds of billions, possibly trillions, but what do strings of ciphers amount to when jockeyed by self-seeking labor leaders who are chiefly concerned about assuring their own tenure in highly lucrative positions?

Thoughtful people, which naturally includes a majority of those who are being made to appear to be demanding portal-to-portal pay, as a result of suits already filed, or in prospect, seem inclined to regard the whole thing as a joke—but it is not a joke to the returned servicemen who have recollections of what they went through and who find many of their stay-at-home associates comfortably housed, spending liberally out of good pay, and asking for more money, while countless veterans are without homes or crowded in with relatives, because more attention has been given to politics, profits, and appeasement of labor leaders than to the welfare of veterans.

If special privileges are to be granted, or extra compensation awarded, it is the underpaid veterans who should receive first consideration—and if the portal-to-portal fantasy, as applied to customary industrial practices, is to attain the status of court sanction, then no demands made upon the Government by veterans' organizations can be fairly regarded as extreme.

The element of ridicule has already entered so strongly into public discussion of portal-to-portal pay that mention of the subject is likely to evoke a laugh—except among ex-servicemen, who are more inclined to sneer.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article appearing in the American Press entitled "Mr. Congressman—Here's What America's Country Editors Want Done About Our Nation's Problems."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the New York Herald Tribune on the passing of its editor, Ogden Reid, a most distinguished public servant, under whose direction for one-third of a century that newspaper became one of the most outstanding in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an address delivered by our former colleague, Hon. Clare Boothe Luce, which will run an estimated cost of $220.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address delivered by the president of Cornell University.

SUBSISTENCE PAYMENTS TO VETERAN STUDENTS

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask at this time to call attention of the membership of the House the need of immediately correcting the situation indicated in the following telegram I just received:

CHAMPAIGN, ILL.

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Conditions prevailing University of Illinois due to extreme and unwarranted delay by Veterans' Administration in making subsistence payments to veteran students is disgrace. Veterans required to borrow if possible but more often forced to do without necessities and even withdraw from school. As the Representative of 125,000 alumni and former students, you are urged to immediately force Veterans' Administration to eliminate red tape and bring all payments to date. Advise action taken by you.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS ALUMNI ASSOCIATION, VICTOR CULLEN, President.

I have also called upon the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration to correct this situation.

REPUBLICAN MAJORITY

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I think it due the Republican membership of this House that it should be publicly said of them by one belonging to the minority that their behavior since the election of last fall has been as nearly perfect in my judgment as is possible for human conduct to be.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is referring to the House, I presume.

Mr. COX. I am. They have taken their victory with becoming modesty, just as a gallant warrior should take victory over a fallen adversary. There has been no boasting, no threats, and no arrogance, but only an evident desire and purpose to serve to the best of their ability the best interests of our country.

The example that they have set, Mr. Speaker, is one that might be emulated with profit by others. If fate should mistakenly decree that the next President of the country must be a Republican, I hope he will be selected from the Republican membership of this House. Mr. Speaker, I observe that the eyes of my brethren are all turned to the very able and the very popular occupant of the chair.

TERMINAL-LEAVE PAY

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to a service this House did not complete in the last session, that is, to provide cash payments for terminal leave. The Members of this House will recall the speech I made when we adopted the conference report. I said then that the first bill I would introduce in this Congress would be to provide that these bonds be redeemable in cash—see page 10588 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 31, 1946. To carry that out I have introduced H. R. 3 of the Eightieth Congress, providing that terminal-leave-pay bonds shall be redeemable in cash. I hope the Committee on Armed Services will give immediate consideration to that bill.

Let me quote what the now distinguished Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], said on the occasion of adopting conference report, as shown on page 10583 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 31, 1946:

I want to serve notice that nothing is ever settled until it is settled right. If the officers could have cash, then there is no reason on earth why the private soldiers should not be treated the same. After all, it is the good old private and noncom who carried the greater burdens of war. I believe, whatever we do today, this fight will continue. If we do not give fair, equal treatment today, why, then, the next Congress will see the injustice is corrected. Eventually the American people will see that fair play prevails.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that with your good influence you will see that this bill is considered early, and passed without delay. Justice and fairness cry out for the passage of this bill, No. 3 of the Eightieth Congress.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, during the Seventy-ninth Congress I introduced a resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States relating to the abolition of capital punishment. I have noticed in the press that on this coming Friday the State of Mississippi will execute two children. For that reason I am again introducing my resolution. I hope it will be approved by the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUBER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is misrepresenting the State of Mississippi. That State is getting ready to execute a couple of the worst criminals that ever murdered an innocent man.

Mr. HUBER. The press says they are children. I do not know the facts of the case, but they are still children.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman should not smear a State until he gets the facts.

Mr. HUBER. The fact is that they are children.

Mr. RANKIN. The fact is that they are among the worst criminals in this country.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PRICE of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by General Bradley.

PRODUCTION OF FERTILIZER

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, reliable, old-established fertilizer dealers tell me that the Army and the Commodity Credit Corporation have taken all available tank cars away from the fertilizer industry for the purpose of shipping sulfuric acid to make ammonia sulfate for export. These dealers also inform me that unless these orders are canceled and fertilizer is permitted to be produced for the farmers of this country, the farmers will not be able to obtain even 20 percent of their usual requirements.

It is somewhat strange, but I must admit somewhat in keeping with some other steps being officially taken, for our officials to work so directly and adversely against our people.

AIR ACCIDENTS

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I am certain we have all been distressed at the information that has come of numerous air accidents during the last few months. I wish to assure the House that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is intensely interested in this subject. It has already taken steps through the agencies that now exist to obtain all the necessary data that will enable it to recommend to this Congress such legislation as may be necessary to promote safety. To that end I have today, as the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce introduced a resolution that will give the committee full authority and the right of subpena to investigate these accidents.

A copy of the resolution I have introduced today reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or by the direction of its chairman any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee, or a member thereof designated by him, and shall be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the committee, among its other duties, to investigate such accidents as may have occurred to aircraft during the year 1946 and which may occur during the years following as the committee may deem important, with a view to ascertaining the cause or causes thereof, particularly as they may relate to the laws and regulations and the administration of laws and regulations relating to operation and inspection of airplanes and safety equipment and devices and the adequacy of airways facilities, flight control, communications, and landing aids and any other matters which the committee may deem necessary to investigate for the purpose of obtaining information to enable it to make recommendations for the improvement of safety and flight operations.

SEC. 3. In carrying out its powers and duties, the committee or any subcommittee thereof may call upon any department, agency, or establishment of the United States to furnish facilities and assistance to aid in such investigation.

The following letter was addressed to Hon. William A. M. Burden, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, United States Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.; Hon. James M. Landis, chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, United States Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.; Hon. Theodore P. Wright, Administrator, Civil Aeronautics Administration, United States Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.:

JANUARY 14, 1947.

In view of the many accidents that have recently occurred in the operation of airlines, I would appreciate it if you would immediately submit to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce all data that is readily available which would show the number of accidents, the number of lives lost and the number injured, and also the lines on which the accidents occurred and the locality of each, as well as the amount of property damage involved in these accidents, together with any reports that have been made after the investigation of such accidents.

I would also like to receive for the committee any recommendations that you have made up to this time which in your judgment would promote better safety, together with any other information which would give the committee any light in fixing the responsibility for these accidents and that would assist the committee in the consideration of this important subject.

Your immediate attention to this request will be of considerable help, even if at the moment you are able only to submit a partial report.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES A. WOLVERTON,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

AIR ACCIDENTS

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce say what he has just said. There are facts which should be brought to life on the air accidents of this Nation, which would astound every sensibly thinking person in this Nation. Remember this: Neither Eddie Rickenbacker nor any other executive of any line in the Nation can explain away to the satisfaction of the dear ones whose charred bodies are lying in North Carolina, Virginia, and the rest of the States of this Union, the reason for these accidents. The only people to whom the American people can come and get redress is the American Congress. They are asking you and me today, as American Congressmen, to do something. We cannot explain away our responsibility, my colleagues, and if we do not do something now and do it well we will never be in a position to properly discharge our duties.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I sincerely hope that my friend is not pointing an accusing finger at Eddie Rickenbacker.

Mr. RIVERS. I am not pointing an accusing finger at anybody.

Mr. COX. I trust that the gentleman would not do that.

Mr. RIVERS. May I point this out to the gentleman. Eddie Rickenbacker is the head of the Eastern Air Lines. I am not saying anything abusive about anybody. I am pointing an accusing finger at anybody who wants to explain away the reason why an airplane is 60 miles off its course by saying, "Maybe it was this, or maybe it was that." I say to you, there should not be any such explaining away. I think the American people ought to know the reason for a plane being 60 miles off its course. I think the American people ought to know whether or not the CAB is properly staffed. I think the American people ought to know whether the CAA was derelict in its duties. Lastly, I think the American people ought to know whether or not the Congress has been penny-wise and pound foolish in not giving these people a sufficient amount of money to properly man these stations. Something should be done, my colleagues, and done now. And anybody who is at fault should be accused and, furthermore, they should be accused in the public forum of American public opinion.

Mr. COX. I think Eddie Rickenbacker is being done a great injustice if the inference can be drawn from what the gentleman says that there has been any dereliction on his part. Mr. Rickenbacker, in my judgment, is one of the most distinguished citizens of the country and has already been punished as a result of neglect far beyond what is excusable.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the gentleman that Eddie Rickenbacker has not been impugned or accused any more than the American Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] may have an additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. I am personally well acquainted with Eddie Rickenbacker. I think he is one of the great heroes of all times. I do not think Eddie Rickenbacker is personally responsible for this air wreck. I think I could tell you where one trouble lies.

Mr. RIVERS. If the gentleman will pardon the interruption, do I have this time or does the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. RANKIN. I am asking you.

Mr. RIVERS. Then may I answer the gentleman?

Mr. RANKIN. I am saying this in the gentleman's own time. That is the reason I asked for this time for the gentleman. I do not want to see Eddie Rickenbacker done an injustice.

Mr. RIVERS. In answer to the gentleman, I do not want the Congress to say I am trying to accuse Eddie Rickenbacker. I say not Eddie Rickenbacker or anybody else can explain away the reason why an airplane is 60 miles off its course with people getting killed and not having anything done about it. I do not want the impression to be left that the record of the air lines is not a great one. I understand that for domestic operations alone, there were only 1.24 passenger fatalities per hundred million passenger-miles in 1946 as compared with 2.14 in 1945, an improvement of approximately 40 percent. This is over twice as safe as the 1945 record—1946 figures not yet available—for passenger automobiles of 2.9 deaths per 100,000,000 passenger-miles. I want our air lines to be the greatest on the face of the earth. At the same time I feel that Congress should be alert to its duty in assisting in any endeavor on the part of this great industry to improve, protect, and expand throughout the globe. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD a copy of a brief which I am respectfully submitting to the Honorable CHARLES A. WOLVERTON, chairman-designate of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who has just announced on the floor his introduction of a resolution to go into the whole air picture. I sincerely and earnestly hope that no secrecy will veil the deliberations of this great committee. Any secrecy surrounding the interrogation of any witness, be they Government or otherwise, will not be understood by the American people.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1947.

Hon. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON,
Member of Congress,
Chairman-Designate, Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am most respectfully enclosing some thoughts I have on some of the elements that should be considered by your subcommittee when it convenes to investigate the air-lines set-up.

You have, I am sure, observed from the press that certain deliberations of the Senate have been secret. May I ask you to avoid secrecy when witnesses are called. The public will greatly misunderstand any reason for not making every part of the testimony before you available to them.

With full expression of my high esteem, believe me to be

Sincerely yours,

L. MENDEL RIVERS,
Member of Congress.

[Enclosure.]

To continue my remarks of yesterday with reference to the dilemma in which we now find the air-transportation industry of this country, I should like to make a few pointed suggestions.

I, for one, am not willing to let the disastrous accident of Eastern Air Lines at Galax, Va., last week pass by without a complete and thorough investigation by Congress. It is high time that some agency ferreted out the cause or causes of at least one accident and made a full and complete report thereof to Congress, together with the remedies necessary to prevent future accidents. Therefore, in the case of this accident in which 18 lives were lost, I demand that such an investigation be immediately undertaken and that the following parties be subpenaed to place on the record their expert knowledge of their version of this disastrous incident:

1. Eastern Air Lines' management, including the meteorologists, maintenance manager, and dispatcher who were responsible for this particular flight.

2. The engineers of the manufacturer of the ship in question.

3. The manufacturer of the aircraft engines which were installed in the ship.

4. The manufacturers of the instruments in this particular plane.

5. The appropriate official of Aeronautical Radio Corp., Inc.

6. The United States Weather Bureau officials in the area of the accident.

7. The Civil Aeronautics Administration's representatives in the area of the accident; and most important of all, the Civil Aeronautics Administrator, its inspectors of the flight in question, control-tower operators who were in contact with the flight, and the division head of that agency who recommends the civil air regulations which are promulgated by the Civil Aeronautics Board; and all appropriate officials of the Civil Aeronautics Board who deal with the investigation and reports on accidents.

So serious is this situation that it is my purpose to limit the scope of this investigation as much as possible at this time. However, the unpardonable delays which are being experienced by certain cities of this Nation receiving air-transportation services due to the cumbersome administrative processes of the Civil Aeronautics Board, prompts me at this time to also demand that the Civil Aeronautics Board file a report with Congress of every new route proceeding which it now has before it in which the public hearing has been held but no decision rendered. The Board should be required to show the date upon which the hearing began and ended, and the length of time that has elapsed without any decision having been reached.

It is my conviction that the taxpayers' interests, as represented by the city and State officials and their duly elected Members of this Congress, have been too long ignored in these new route cases by the Civil Aeronautics Board. I can cite you in my own State of South Carolina alone a number of excellent airports with complete facilities installed at the taxpayers' expense which have been waiting for years for decisions by the Board in new route cases that would offer them the advantages of air transportation to which they are justly entitled.

It is my understanding that the Civil Aeronautics Administration has, during recent months, entered on a program of inactivating certain range stations and control towers throughout this Nation. It occurs to me that this may be an ill-advised economy project, and that if they are inactivating such stations they may very well also be failing to keep the maintenance standards of the operating stations up to the high level of efficiency that is necessary for public safety. The full and complete facts concerning this situation must be revealed immediately.

If there ever were agencies created by Congress which, of necessity, require the services of thoroughly competent technical experts, they are the Civil Aeronautics Administration and the Civil Aeronautics Board. I therefore propose that the investigation which I have suggested be broadened sufficient to inquire into the qualifications of the technicians and regulatory experts of both of these agencies in connection with this entire matter.

THE NATIONAL CONSERVATION PLEDGE

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, during 1946 a very interesting national contest was held among conservationists throughout America to try to arrive at an appropriate wording for a national conservation pledge. It is the hope of the sponsors of this contest that this pledge might be popularized to the extent that children would learn it in school and that people include it in their speeches and articles in order to help quicken the conscience of America to the need for a wise conservation of its great natural resources.

I would like to read at this time the wording which has been finally chosen by the judges as the text of the national conservation pledge:

I give my pledge as an American to save and faithfully to defend from waste the natural resources of my country—its soil and minerals, its forests, waters, and wildlife.

Mr. Speaker, World War II, as World War I, was a great consumer of our natural resources, and this Congress will do well, as I know it will, to devote some of its attention to the conservation of our natural resources, including pure waters, forests, minerals, our wildlife and our soil.

The contest to select a national conservation pledge was directed by Raymond J. Brown, editor of Outdoor Life. It brought in hundreds of worth-while suggestions. It was my privilege to serve as one of the national judges and I am sure that the winning text serves as a conservation pledge which faithfully reflects the sentiments of millions of conservationists in this Republic. I hope it will aid in the program of education required to make Americans conservation-minded.

If we protect our natural resources now, our natural resources will protect us all in the years to come.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, revise and extend my remarks, and include therein an article describing the only bill that the Spanish-American War veterans are asking to have passed at this session of Congress, which is contained in the Stars and Stripes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am dropping in the hopper today a bill at the request of the Spanish-American War veterans which is the only bill they are seeking to have passed during this session of Congress. I am sure the committee will want to give this bill a hearing at an early date.

The National Tribune, of January 16, 1947, published an explanation of the bill, as follows:

SPANISH WAR VETS ASK HORIZONTAL PENSION BOOST FOR ALL ON ROLLS—BASED ON LIVING COSTS, ARE READY TO INTRODUCE NEW BILL IN HOUSE—ALSO ASK MODIFIED WIDOWS' BENEFITS BASED ON CIVIL WAR PRECEDENT—GENERAL BRADLEY IS SPEAKER AT ANNUAL MEETING—OTHER COMMITTEES ALSO CONVENE IN WASHINGTON

The principal legislative effort of the United Spanish War Veterans during the Eightieth Congress will be on behalf of a bill to grant a 20-percent horizontal increase in pensions to all beneficiaries now on the pension rolls, both veterans and dependents. Also, every effort will be made to obtain a change in the widows' law so that those dependents who married after December 31, 1937, may be eligible, under certain conditions, to receive pensions.

The United Spanish War Veterans will also support any effort made to eliminate the "pauper oath" in its application to veterans' and widows' benefits, and will encourage the naming of a major committee of the Senate to consider all legislation pertaining to their group.

Meeting in its board room at the national headquarters in Washington last Sunday, the national committee on legislation and its administration quickly got down to business and wound up its work in one session, under National Chairman Judge Edward S. Matthias, of the Ohio Supreme Court. The group listened to a brief talk by Administrator of Veterans' Affairs Gen. Omar N. Bradley, in which particular reference was made to those problems facing the veterans of 1898–1902, their widows, and dependents. The committee and members of their families, together with numerous other officials and Members of Congress, were guests of Commander in Chief John White on Monday night at a dinner at the Mayflower Hotel.

Also meeting over the week end were the national finance committee and the national executive committee.

FOLLOWED MILWAUKEE MANDATE

After a review of legislation enacted for Spanish War veterans and their widows had been made by Judge Matthias and the history of both legislation and the manner of its administration had been discussed, the committee unanimously adopted the policy which had been endorsed at the Milwaukee encampment last August. By it there will be followed only such precedents as have already been established for veterans and dependents of the Civil War. Generally, this policy received executive sanction in 1935 with the approval by the then President of the 1935 act. In order to seek a just bill that would assist all of the membership and its auxiliary women to meet increased living costs, the 20-percent increase across the board was decided upon as the most equitable.

It was also determined to include in one bill, the suggested text of which appears later in this article, a provision to make eligible for pensions those widows of veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Uprising who married after December 31, 1937. Such widows, under the proposal, must have reached the age of 60 years, must have lived with their veteran husbands for at least 10 years next preceding death, except where the separation is without fault of a widow, and they cannot have remarried. This program follows exactly the law enacted December 8, 1944, for Civil War widows who married after June 27, 1905. That is Public Law 471, Seventy-eighth Congress.

Although it was decided not to introduce separate legislation seeking the elimination of needs clauses, particularly as they apply to hospitalization of Spanish War veterans, the committee voted to support such legislation as well as bills which would place the jurisdiction of all affairs relating to veterans and their dependents in one Senate committee.

WAR CLAIMS CENTRALIZED

Following the presentation of General Bradley, the committee went on record by resolution in an expression of appreciation for the services he has rendered to veterans as Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

General Bradley told the group it had been his decision to retain, centralized in Washington, all of the claims relating to Spanish War veterans and their widows, basing his decision on the fact even though every effort was being made to completely decentralize the activities of all other veterans and widows, problems facing the Spanish War group are peculiar to them. The retention of their claims folders in Washington, he said, should obviate any necessity of training expert claims men who would have to be furnished if folders were farmed out to regional offices.

The General spoke of the present 215,000 employes now under his jurisdiction, and said that even though it had been hoped to get along with fewer, it was his belief that the employment load would soon level off and reduce itself. He sought the assistance of the Spanish War group in the unlimited field of rehabilitation being undertaken by his agency. Bradley noted that although the last available figures showed less than 3,000 Spanish War veterans in hospitals, and 870 under domiciliary care, there were all-told some 96,000 veterans occupying hospital beds now, 83,000 of them in Veterans' Administration hospitals. He reviewed his trials in obtaining competent physicians and surgeons, and related that the service has been vastly improved, that there are now some 4,000 doctors employed full time and that others "on tour" with the Army and Navy will join the Veterans' Administration soon.

General Bradley also announced that although the 116 hospitals now in operation include 17 Army and Navy units of temporary construction, "There are 50 new hospitals now on the drawing board, and we are working on revised criteria to make them the best in the country. We have working with us closely the American Institute of Architects."

In their larger terms, Bradley discussed other major problems, including insurance, which he said was his biggest headache, and he indicated that complaints about that branch would be largely dismissed within another 6 months, a third sooner than they were solved following World War I. He issued a warning, however, that "we must weigh very carefully what further is to be done for our veterans, who must have the most just and reasonable program available consistent with what is best for the country."

MANY OFFICERS PRESENT

Only one member of the committee, Judge Leon McCord, of Alabama, was absent, he having had to prepare for the opening of his court in New Orleans. Be it enacted, etc., That all monthly rates of pension payable to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection and dependents of such veterans which are payable under laws reenacted by the act of August 13, 1935 (49 Stat. 614; 38 U. S. C. 368, 369) or under acts amendatory or supplemental to such laws are hereby increased by 20 percent. The increases provided by this action shall be effective from the first day of the second calendar month following the date of enactment of this act.

SEC. 2. The dependent unremarried widow of a veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection, who is barred from the receipt of pension because her marriage to the veteran occurred subsequent to December 31, 1937, but who is otherwise entitled to such pension under the act of May 1, 1926 (44 Stat. 382; 38 U. S. C. 364a, as reenacted by the act of August 13, 1935 (49 Stat. 614; 38 U. S. C. 368) shall be entitled to pension in her own right under said act, as amended, under the conditions specified therein (except date of marriage) and at the rate authorized by section 4 of the act of August 7, 1946 (Public Law 611, 79th Cong.) as amended by section 1 hereof and to the additional pension provided for children under the act of May 1, 1926, as amended, provided she married the veteran 10 or more years prior to his death and lived with him continuously from the date of marriage to the date of his death except where there was a separation which was due to misconduct of or procured by the veteran without the fault of the widow: Provided, That if pension has been granted to a child or children of the veteran, the widow shall not be entitled to the pension authorized by this section until the pension to the child or children terminates, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her; and when these conditions are fulfilled and the pension is granted to the widow, payment of pension to such child or children shall cease; except that in the event the amount being paid to such child or children is less than the amount authorized to the widow by this act, then the difference between said amounts will be paid to the widow: Provided further, That no pension shall be payable under this section to a widow under 60 years of age.

SEC. 3. Payment of pension as provided in section 2 shall be effective from the date of receipt of application in the Veterans' Administration, after the date of enactment of this act, in the form prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. Pension under section 2 shall not be paid to the widow of a veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection, who has remarried either once or more than once since the death of the veteran, and upon the remarriage of such a widow her pension shall be terminated. The penal and forfeiture provisions of laws and regulations administered by the Veterans' Administration providing pensions for veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and Philippine Insurrection, shall be applicable to the provisions of this act.

THE GOVERNOR OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I agree with much the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] had to say about the Members of the opposite party as far as it referred to the membership of the House.

But I do not underwrite the lynching of my State in another body.

To my mind, it was a deplorable fiasco, and one that set a most dangerous precedent. If a few hold-overs whom the people have not voted on for many years can shut the doors in the face of a man who has just been elected, deny him the right to defend himself, and his State the right to representation, in order to pander to certain radical elements, and certain un-American elements whom that Member has offended by fighting for American principles, I cannot underwrite or applaud such unwarranted proceedings. That could not happen in the House.

But I arose to reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUBER], who has just attacked the State of Mississippi because a few communistic intermeddlers cannot bluff Hon. Fielding Wright, the Governor of my State, into stopping the execution of a couple of young Negroes who went out and conspired to murder an innocent person, then took their guns and perpetrated one of the most brutal murders ever known.

Just such stuff as this is causing crime to spread over the country. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUBER] knows, if he reads the papers, that an innocent white nurse was raped in the shadow of the dome of this Capitol, right out there on the Library grounds, only night before last by a black Negro brute, and he is said to have been waylaying another woman when the police caught him.

Mr. HUBER. It has nothing to do with the murder of innocent children.

Mr. RANKIN. These criminals to which the gentleman refers were not innocent children. Their ages have been flagrantly misrepresented. They were old enough to take their guns and go out and conspire and murder an innocent man, and they are old enough to take the consequences.

All the Communists in America cannot bluff Fielding Wright, the Governor of Mississippi.

But just such stuff as this is encouraging crime. There have been more white women raped by Negro brutes in the District of Columbia in the last 10 years than there had been in the entire history of the District of Columbia up to that time.

They have been encouraged, if not inspired by just such silly attacks as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUBER] has just made on the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MCCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a powerful sermon rendered recently by the Most Reverend Bryan J. McEntegart, bishop of Ogdensburg, N. Y.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] is recognized for 25 minutes.

WORLD FEDERATION OF TRADE-UNIONS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to the charge made by the American Federation of Labor that four American military government zonal manpower division chiefs in Germany had recently conferred in Paris with officials of the so-called World Federation of Trade-Unions "to stampede German trade-unions into affiliation with the WFTU." The American Federation of Labor called this a "desperate attempt by the Kremlin to grab control of organized labor in Germany." Although this charge was subsequently denied by Lt. Gen. Lucius D. Clay, United States military governor in Germany, the following facts stand out:

Mr. Michael Ross, American CIO representative at the meeting of the WFTU executive bureau, held in Paris on December 16 to 18, did not deny that these manpower chiefs were present. Nor did he deny that at this bureau meeting a resolution had been adopted, indicating the desire of the WFTU to secure eventual affiliation of the German trade-unions.

It should also be noted that Mr. Max Lowenthal, recently appointed general counsel to Lieutenant General Clay, is a man with long-established ties to Communist organizations and whose loyalty record is highly questionable. Another adviser and close associate of Mr. Lowenthal is George Shaw Wheeler, whose loyalty record is even more questionable.

The American Federation of Labor legitimately raises the question why representatives of the State and War Departments were not consulted on this matter and emphasizes the seriousness of any possible entanglement in our military zone with what they call the Kremlin's world-wide fifth column. In view of the fact that the record and the activities of the World Federation of Trade-Unions and its affiliates shows a policy of definite hostility to the United States, I am seriously concerned about the attitude taken toward this organization by our representatives not only in Germany but throughout the world. Let us look at the record, which is significant because never in its brief career has the WFTU uttered a single world of criticism of the policies of the Soviet Government or of labor and working conditions either in Russia or countries under its control.

The syndicalist minority of the French General Federation of Labor has pointed out that the WFTU has never "protested the uprooting of millions of people, the forced-labor camps, and the terrible conditions in which millions of vanquished now live" in Soviet-controlled territory. Small wonder that the Soviet bloc of delegates to the United Nations has displayed a marked tenderness for the World Federation of Trade-Unions.

No individual has done more in the interests of world labor than William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. Nevertheless, he felt constrained to point out the serious limitations of the World Federation of Trade-Unions in dealing with the conditions of labor, as follows:

> Any attempt to improve the standard of living of all workers on an international basis would face the difficulty that the Russian trade-unions would never and could never assume responsibility for putting the decisions of the World Federation into effect on the territory of the U. S. S. R. Even the prevention of unfair competition by cheap labor would be acceptable to the Soviet delegates only on condition that Russia be exempted from these decisions with regard to the products of Russian prison labor and also with regard to underpaid Russian free labor. (New Leader, August 4, 1945, p. 1.)

The allegedly defunct Communist International and its affiliated Communist Parties are carrying out a world-wide agitation against "the trusts". The target of this barrage is, of course, the United States. The WFTU and its affiliates have echoed this type of propaganda, as the following illustrations will show:

In September 1945, it adopted a resolution demanding "that the World Federation of Trade-Unions be asked to study measures to be taken to control trusts and international monopolies."

The Indian delegate to the WFTU meeting, in September 1945, presented the following alternatives to his fellow delegates:

> The choice before the workers of Europe and the workers of the world is between the finance capital of the United States on the one hand and the social economic order which is represented by Soviet Russia alone on the other.

Coupled with this agitation is an attempt to accuse the United States of inciting war against the Soviet Union. Surely the world knows we have bent over backwards to seek peaceful and satisfactory adjustments with the Soviet Government; we have sought no territorial aggrandizement, while they have armed to the teeth and have entered upon a campaign of active expansionism. Nevertheless, this is the Communist and WFTU refrain throughout the world. Let me cite Mr. William Z. Foster, chairman of the Communist Party, U. S. A., in the Worker of April 21, 1946:

> It is imperative that the world's workers, through the World Federation of Trade-Unions, should intervene in the proceedings of the United Nations in order to defeat the imperialists who are now active in that body and are threatening the peace of the world. * * * It should ring with protest against the war-mongering course now being followed by the American delegation in the United Nations. It should let Truman and Byrnes know that they are violating the peace will of the American people.

In an attack upon the American Federation of Labor and the United States, Benoit Frachon, Communist secretary of the French General Federation of Labor, WFTU affiliate, declared on October 26, 1946:

> These men are ardent interventionists on the side of the cavaliers of the atomic bomb. They are protagonists of a new war, provided its purpose is an attack on the Soviet Union and the European democracies that don't care for the kings of the dollar and the men of the trusts to dictate their form of government.

A leading representative of the WFTU in the Western Hemisphere is Toledano of Mexico, pro-Communist leader of the Latin-American Federation of Labor, who has maintained a continuous diatribe against American interests, through his official organ, the CTAL News. Permit me to quote from the utterances of this vicious demagog:

> North American imperialism is stronger and more aggressive. In Japan it fights democratization by forbidding the splitting up of feudal estates and by protecting the monarch and the rule of feudal lords and monopolies. In Korea it does not hesitate to make use of Japanese and quislings. In the Philippines it jails the guerrilla leaders and flirts with the puppet Roxas. . . . In China it intervenes with loans, arms, planes, and troops in favor of the Chungking government with the aim of wiping out democratic and progressive movements (November 19, 1945).
> When Wall Street or its Latin-American feudal gauleiters speak of the good-neighbor policy, they mean that the United States should be the big owning country, exercising complete military, economic and political domination over 20 good neighbors or colonies, to the south (May 13, 1946).

The National Maritime Union—CIO—which is affiliated with the WFTU and which has received every consideration from the American Government in its dealings before Federal labor boards, has taken a similar position at its National Council meeting in December 1946. I quote:

> We must make these imperialist tie-ups of the American shipowners clear to our members and to the American people. We must make it clear that the imperialist plans of American big business mean unemployment and substandard wages for American workers, as well as enslavement for other peoples. We must engage in an all-around fight that will expose this international conspiracy and bust it wide open. * * * We must strengthen the WFTU as an instrument for fighting imperialism.

In line with accepted Communist policy, the National Maritime Union calls upon workers throughout the world to join in international strikes against the so-called American imperialists. Says the NMU:

> We must enlist their support for our program, and develop joint struggles with them on the broader issues of American foreign policy.

This meeting also called for the building of ship committees, a Communist device for subverting discipline aboard American ships.

The NMU expressed its close solidarity with Toledano's Latin-American Federation of Labor, as follows:

> The trade-unionists in the United States have a special responsibility to expose and fight against the ravages of American imperialism upon the Latin-American peoples. * * * We should * * * strengthen our relations with the CTAL.

The WFTU and its affiliated organizations have sought to encourage the Communist policy of international strikes intended to disrupt American commerce and industry. Prior to the June 15, 1946, deadline of the threatened strike of the Committee for Maritime Unity, headed by Harry Bridges, against the United States Government and American shipping interests, this committee had received assurance of strike support from the WFTU, the Latin-American Federation of Labor, and affiliated waterfront workers of Australia, New Zealand, and other countries. In the name of 800 French seamen affiliated with the WFTU, Hyppolite Dennis pledged "full support to the NMU-CIO strike by not sailing on any ships until the NMU has won its strike"—Daily Worker, September 19, 1946, page 3.

For the first time in history—

Declared the Communist New Masses exultingly—

the newly formed WFTU, with 60,000,000 members, will throw its earth-encircling weight behind an American strike.

In the CTAL News of June 10, 1946, Toledano announced:

Two hundred thousand sailors of the merchant marine, longshoremen, and warehousemen are committed to resort to strike unless the shipowners of the United States accede to their just demands. * * * Should the maritime strike be called in the United States of America, the workers of Latin America, and especially sailors and dock workers, will know and be ready to the duty, the welcome duty, dictated by their solidarity with their comrades in the north.

The WFTU is presently agitating such solidarity strikes on an international scale against Franco Spain, to further Soviet designs in the Mediterranean.

Would you know some reason why sugar is so scarce in the United States? Then look into the international strikes conducted by Harry Bridges and other WFTU adherents in Hawaii and Cuba among the sugarcane workers. While pretending to be interested in the working conditions of these workers, their real aim is to cripple the American sugar industry.

While the World Federation of Trade-Unions has not dared to demand independence for Poland, Yugoslavia, Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania, Finland, or any other Soviet puppet state, it has taken up the cudgels for the independence of Puerto Rico, which was interpreted by a United Press dispatch as "a slap at United States administration."

The World Federation of Trade-Unions and its affiliates are being utilized particularly as instruments for the condemnation of American foreign policy in order to force us to accede to Soviet expansionist aims. On September 7, 1946, the leaders of the Polish trade-unions adopted a resolution which read, in part, as follows:

Mr. Byrnes' speech constitutes a great danger, a danger of diverging from the road of general peace followed by the United Nations during the war, which road they promised to follow after the war.

Mr. Byrnes' speech strongly undermines the policy of democratization and denazification of Germany, and may contribute to the rebirth of German imperialism. * * *

The policy which Secretary of State Byrnes proposes to follow by encouraging German imperialists constitutes a danger to Poland for whom German imperialism is always fraught with the threat of new aggression. * * *

The organized workers of Poland appeal to the workers of the United States * * * and to the leaders of the CIO, and the AFL * * * to oppose strongly in the name of peace the reactionary groups which tend to restore German imperialism.

According to the CIO News of March 25, 1946, the World Federation sent an investigating commission to Germany, which reported in critical terms on conditions in the American zone, while commenting with highest praise on conditions in the Soviet zone. It charged that Nazis are being sheltered in responsible jobs in the American zone. By curious coincidence, the Soviet Government has expressed a similar criticism recently—New York Times, January 9, 1947.

Louis Saillant, general secretary of the WFTU, went so far as to defy the decisions of the United Nations, in advocating the Soviet-sponsored plan for the German trade-unions. According to the New York Times of June 19, 1946, he declared:

The World Federation of Trade-Unions executive committee will demand a centralized German trade-union movement regardless of what political arrangements are made for Germany at the Paris Conference.

Four organizations, including Yugoslav unions and the Italian General Confederation of Labor, whose representatives had been meeting in Paris under the auspices of the World Federation of Trade-Unions, demanded that American troops be withdrawn from the Trieste area—Worker, November 3, 1946, page 15. They condemned the Allied military government for its action against an illegal strike of WFTU adherents calculated to pressure the decisions of the United Nations—New York Times, October 22, 1946, page 10.

In the Shansi Honan-Hopei liberated area of north China, alleged representatives of 15,000 organized railway workers voted to appeal to the World Federation of Trade-Unions for the withdrawal of American forces from China—Daily Worker, January 21, 1946, page 8. The WFTU has never taken any similar action against the occupation of Soviet troops anywhere in the world.

Unions affiliated with the WFTU have shown a marked anti-American attitude particularly where issues of American security were involved. The Federation of Icelandic Trade-Unions called a 24-hour strike in the Reykjavik area in protest against the proposed granting of air-base privileges to the United States—New York Times, September 25, 1946, page 6.

The Ecuadorean Federation of Labor was aligned with the Communist Party of that country in November 1945, in opposition to the granting of air bases to the United States and denounced the alleged attempt of United States monopolies to obtain economic hegemony over Latin America—CTAL News, November 12, 1945.

Similarly the Cuban Federation of Labor attacked United States Army officers at the San Antonio de los Banos Airbase as violating the Cuban constitution in their attitude toward the Cuban unions. These forces have vigorously opposed granting air-base privileges to the United States on the island of Cuba—CTAL News, November 12, 1945.

American Army officials are deeply concerned at the present time by the well-financed drive of the United Public Workers of America—CIO—led by well-known Communists in the Panama Canal Zone, in which 17,000 workers have allegedly been enlisted. Full details are given in an illuminating article in the magazine Plain Talk for November 1946. Toledano's Latin-American Federation of Labor and the Pan-American Federation of Labor have announced their full support of this campaign directed at the very heart of our continental defense system.

In the CIO News of January 6, 1947, Len De Caux, its editor, applauds the decision of the recent Costa Rica conference of the Latin-American Federation of Labor denouncing the Truman Inter-American defense plan as "big stick" diplomacy, seeking United States imperialist domination over its weaker neighbors. The Clayton trade proposals are also criticized as an attempt to break down tariff protections for infant Latin-American industries. While Philip Murray, president of the CIO, has never attacked Russian imperialism by name, he has fulminated against imperialism in foreign affairs according to the Worker of September 1, 1946, page 2. Against whom is Mr. Murray directing this attack? We would all like to know.

Permit me to add some significant comments from the able pen of Mr. Hanson W. Baldwin in the New York Times of January 9, 1947, page 18. Commenting on the Communist-controlled National Maritime Union—CIO—and its affiliated organizations in the maritime industry, all linked with the WFTU, he declared:

Complete control of these unions by the Communists could hog-tie America in a time of international crisis. * * * The Congress must make impossible a repetition of last summer's catastrophic blow to Alaska and the Aleutians, a geographical area of tremendous strategic importance. Any shipping strikes that virtually strangle Alaska as the recent strikes did, and that also imperil an adequate defense in the Hawaiian Islands cannot be tolerated.

This Congress in considering labor legislation must take a firm and definite position toward all labor organizations giving evidence of operating under foreign control or discipline.

In its world-wide assault upon the American system of free enterprise, the World Federation of Trade-Unions is seeking to undermine and destroy a way of life that has given the American workers the highest standard of living in the world, under conditions of freedom and opportunity which no country can surpass. I do not claim that the United States is a blissful paradise, that we have no evils which we must correct. But I do claim that in terms of human values, social, economic, and individual freedom, we shine by comparison with that self-proclaimed workers' paradise, the Soviet Union, with its slave labor camps, its dictatorship, and its denial of the dignity of the individual.

American labor has recognized this. Mr. George Meany, secretary-treasurer of the American Federation of Labor, in an article entitled "We Back America" in the July 1946 American Federationist, has declared:

In its relations with the other nations of the earth, our country must of necessity be a unit if it is to be effective. There cannot be one foreign policy for the American worker and another for the American businessman. * * * We must succeed or fail as one indivisible unit. * * * Did the people of America want to win in order to acquire the territory of some other nation? Did our national will to win have its inspiration in the hope that we could control the thinking of other peoples along religious lines? Did we, as a people, desire by military victory to impose our form of government on any other peoples? All these questions can be truthfully answered in the negative.

In view of the facts I have presented, which could be amplified, it should be clear to anyone that the World Federation of Trade-Unions—whose membership figures may be as inflated as the PAC claims—is an organization basically hostile to the interests of the United States and subservient to the interests of the Soviet Government. Our representatives before the United Nations and in all occupied areas should quit pussyfooting and treat it as such.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say that it is claimed by these various organizations that they number 50,000,000 members scattered throughout the various parts of the world, and that they are dominated by communistic influence centered in Russia?

Mr. DONDERO. That is substantially what I said.

Mr. ROBSION. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This Congress, as has several previous Congresses, has abetted and encouraged and promoted and fertilized this whole movement in the United States and throughout the world. We cannot throw the blame on anybody else. It comes right to the well of this House. We might just as well be very plain about it.

What is this Congress going to do about it? What is the Republican administration going to do about it; I mean these labor laws which encourage this situation nationally and internationally. We let the maritime strikes come along and cut the economic throat of Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and Alaska. We do little about it. That organization and its operations against the units of this Government in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Hawaii, and Alaska is just as terrible to those offshore areas as this great international set-up is to the United States.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman asked me what this Congress is going to do about it. This Congress, including every Member on both sides of the aisle who believes in America, is going to answer the demands made by the people of this Nation on the 5th day of last November by doing something to clean it up.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope that will be carried out.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not go all the way with my distinguished friend from Michigan when he says the Congress is responsible for this condition, but the Congress has the responsibility of correcting whatever is wrong.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman is right.

Mr. RANKIN. A man who does not have courage enough to vote the laws to protect this country ought not to be a Member of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. DONDERO. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. MERROW. I wish to compliment the gentleman from Michigan on his very fine statement, and to recall that a year ago last summer he and I traveled in many countries of the Old World. I wonder if the gentleman did not reach the same conclusion I reached, that one of the basic principles in the Soviet foreign policy is to spread communism wherever and whenever possible in all parts of the world.

Mr. DONDERO. I thank my fine friend from New Hampshire. There is no question about it. I think I came to the same conclusion as the able and distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire, that when we arrived back on the shores of America we felt like kneeling down and kissing the earth in gratitude that we were American citizens.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COFFIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution adopted by the Nonbasic Steel Coordinating Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

MORE SUGAR FOR AMERICAN CONSUMERS IN 1947

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], has today appointed a seven-man committee, all of whom are members of the Committee on Agriculture, to investigate the food and agricultural production situation, which is of great concern to all citizens of the United States. I will be privileged, under appointment from the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], to serve as chairman of this important committee. The committee has been authorized to investigate food shortages, and other problems relating to the production of agricultural commodities in short supply.

Because of the urgency of the situation which exists, in the case of sugar, fats and oils, including flaxseed and linseed oil, the committee will begin its investigation today. We hope to make frequent reports and recommendations on our findings. Our objective will be to secure greater production and larger allocations of foods and agricultural products, now in short supply, for American consumers.

I am prompted today to briefly mention the sugar situation. I do so, because the International Emergency Food Council will meet within the next few days to allocate the world supply of sugar, and particularly that part of world sugar production which is controlled by the Government of the United States.

We have been told by reliable sugar authorities in the Department of Agriculture that the allocation of sugar for the world will be made for the entire year of 1947, and on the basis of existing production estimates. I might state here that since I received this information I have been informed by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allocation will now be made on the basis of the first quarter rather than for the entire year, which will be helpful.

Present estimates of world sugar supplies for 1947, are stated to be more than 30,000,000 short tons, as compared with 26,692,000 tons last year. Reliable private estimates indicate there will be more than 32,000,000 short tons of sugar for world consumption. Prewar production of sugar—1935–39—is given at 34,544,000 short tons. Nineteen hundred and forty-six and forty-seven production of sugar in Europe, and other parts of the Eastern Hemisphere has increased by 30 to 70 percent over last year's production. It should, therefore, be quite obvious that the sugar-claiming countries, outside of the United States, will not require as much sugar from our sources of supply as they received in 1946.

Government estimates and reliable reports from industry sources on 1946–47 sugar production for Cuba and the United States, which includes Hawaii and Puerto Rico, is now figured at 9,691,500 short tons, as compared with 7,846,000 short tons last year. This leaves an additional supply of around 1,800,000 tons over last year, which comes under United States control, and I insist that this additional sugar, under our control, less the amount not contracted from Cuba, should be allocated to the American people.

Assuming that the 1946–47 production of sugar from United States areas and Cuba will yield a net increase of from 1,500,000 to 1,700,000 short tons, the per capita distribution of sugar for United States citizens can be increased by 15 pounds for 1947, with an increase of approximately 25 percent for industrial users. Such a distribution is entirely fair and equitable, and would give American consumers each 40 pounds of sugar, as compared with 25 pounds last year, and would increase supplies for industrial users from 60 to between 75 and 80 percent of their base period allowance. Secretary Anderson has promised the American housewives an extra 5 pounds of sugar in April, but this is not enough when we consider existing supplies. No one can give any good reason why we should continue to take from our supplies of sugar and give it to people in other countries, when most of them are now back to nearly prewar production. It is about time that the administration gave a little more consideration to the American people.

I recognize that there are certain officials who want to cut down on American sugar consumption. I have little sympathy for such a policy. In view of the fact that the International Emergency Food Council will meet this month to divide our sugar, I definitely feel that the American people should be advised as to what is taking place, and I also insist that no allocation of sugar should be made for more than the first quarter of 1947 by the Council, and that the amount allocated should not exceed the amount provided in the first quarter of 1946.

The committee will proceed with a thorough investigation of the sugar situation. Hearings will be held and all available data assembled, and it is hoped that a report can be made with recommendations before the end of this month.

Our committee wants an increase in the production of sugar in the United States and offshore areas for the future, and we want to secure our full share of the increased supplies as the result of production in 1946 and 1947. The American people are entitled to such consideration at the hands of their Government. We pay for a large portion of the sugar that is going to other countries of the world either directly or indirectly. A substantial amount in the past has been turned over to UNRRA for distribution in the Balkans and some of the other countries in Europe. UNRRA is being discontinued but I assume that the International Emergency Food Council will see to it that all of those areas, even though they have increased their production of sugar, will have their share, whether it be for domestic purposes or for them to sell in countries of the world.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JENNINGS. Who is it that will comply with that demand of this international set-up that we should take sugar from our people and send it to countries that have not been any too friendly to us within recent months? In fact, some of them have shot down and murdered our nationals.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I think our officials in charge should use the utmost care in the distribution of this sugar.

The last distribution of sugar for 1946 was made by the Combined Food Board, which consisted of officials from Canada, Great Britain, and the United States. The Combined Food Board has gone out of existence, and the International Emergency Food Council has been set up in its place, which includes 18 or 20 nations of the world, all of whom would like to get in on this sugar deal.

We met this morning with the Secretary of Agriculture and presented our views to him, and I am satisfied that if it is within his power to help us get more sugar for the American people he will do so. Unfortunately, he is not always the one who has the last word, because the State Department has something to say about it, and I assume the President also expresses his convictions on what we should do with the sugar that comes under our control.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I noticed one citation of figures gave the consumption per capita at 94 pounds before the war. I think that was the year directly before the war. I wonder what the gentleman's proposal would be in comparison with that figure.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The figure which the gentleman cites, around 93 pounds to 103 pounds per capita as prewar consumption, is the consumption of sugar in all forms, including soft drinks, bakery goods, candy, and also the direct consumption of sugar. What I have proposed is to secure more sugar for the housewives and individuals in the United States for 1947, both direct and indirect consumption, suggesting an increase of 15 pounds of direct sugar, which would make a total of 40 pounds, and then an additional 20 or 25 percent for the industrial uses.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I think the gentleman will bear me out when I say the No. 1 kick, as far as consumers are concerned, is sugar.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman from New York has made a very patent suggestion.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think it would be correct to assert that in 1943 at which time UNRRA was conceived, the plan was then laid down for UNRRA and the International Food Organization to handle this proposition, UNRRA to do the immediate job which we will say is now about finished, and the International Food Organization to follow in the coming months and perhaps years. Is not that correct?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I believe that is substantially correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. To the extent that that is generally true I think we are up against the coldblooded proposition that our Government has already substantially committed itself to go forward with this International Food Organization and collaboration. Now, if this organization is about to make a division or allocation of all sugars that are available and the people of the United States are to receive their first quarter allocations of 1947 then it seems to me the gentleman's committee is coming in at the right moment. Certainly it should not be delayed from coming in as rapidly as possible to dampen down somewhat the desires of those in our Government who are so anxious to diffuse this sugar away from consumers located here on the continent; and I hope the gentleman will continue the good job he is doing. I have great hopes and I am pleased with his ability.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Is not the International Food Organization an integral part of the United Nations organization?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am not positive of that but I would assume that it is.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Of course it is. So there is a task to be met. If we want sugar we must go to the United Nations organization for it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I wish to bring up this point for consideration, living in one of the largest sugar-beet-producing areas in these United States, if not in the world. There are three problems we face if we are to increase our beet acreage, which means an increase in the continental sugar in the United States:

No. 1 is farm machinery. We have heard even today that in 1946 we had an increase in the volume of farm machinery, that is, from the standpoint of the amount of money put into farm machinery. That, however, does not mean a thing in the world to the sugar-beet producer who cannot get the type of farm equipment that is necessary.

No. 2, what are we going to do about labor? How are we going to get hand labor for the additional beet acreage?

No. 3, which is very important as far as I am concerned, what will be the attitude of the Department of Agriculture concerning competing crops? How can you influence the farmer to increase his beet acreage which requires extra money and many extra hand laborers when he can produce beans or potatoes with much less help? I wish the gentleman would discuss these three things.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I wish I had the time to discuss the gentleman's three proposals, for surely they are important. Possibly in the case of potatoes the overproduction of this year may help solve that problem.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to my distinguished friend from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. I share, of course, the interest of the gentleman in securing every possible pound of sugar for the American consumer, but for the benefit of the other Members, would not the gentleman want to add to his statement that the increase in the European countries is, for the most part, in countries which are not the recipients of any sugar allotted to this organization?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I cannot quite agree to that according to the figures that have been provided to us by the Department of Agriculture; but I may say, in part, that is correct.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert a table and statement prepared by the Department of Agriculture showing the production figures for 1946 and other years in all of the countries of the world.

WORLD SUGAR PRODUCTION UP 12 PERCENT

World production of sugar, beet and cane, for the 1946–47 season is estimated at 30,000,000 short tons (raw value), about 12 percent more than the 26,700,000 tons produced in 1945–46 but 14 percent less than the prewar (1935–39) average of 34,700,000 tons. Most of the increase this season occurred in Europe where beet-sugar production made a sharp recovery from the wartime low level, and in North America and the West Indies where conditions have been favorable for the planting and growth of the beet and cane crops. In 1946–47, as in the season just closing, it will not be possible to increase supplies of sugar for consumption to any appreciable extent by drawing on carry-over stocks, because these stocks have been reduced to minimum operating levels.

For the calendar year 1947, it is generally estimated that the world would require at current prices about 5,000,000 tons more sugar than is in prospect if there were no rationing controls. Although there is a prospect of an increase in world production of 3,300,000 tons in 1946–47 over that of the previous season, North America and western Europe (the principal sugar importing areas) are likely to have available only 1,000,000 tons more or about 10 percent, than the 10,900,000 tons recommended for allocation to these areas in 1946.

The Combined Food Board and its successor, the International Emergency Food Council, recommended allocations of sugar for the calendar year 1946 providing for consumption of around 65–70 percent of prewar levels in the major countries where wartime rationing controls are maintained. The recommended allocations were based largely on the out-turn of the 1945–46 sugar crop. In some sugar-exporting countries and in some importing countries, particularly in Central and South America, wartime increases in purchasing power of consumers has resulted in greatly expanded consumption of sugar.

In North and Central America and the West Indies sugar production in 1946–47 is expected to total 10,800,000 tons or about 1,200,000 tons more than was produced in 1945–46 and 2,100,000 larger than the 5-year (1935–39) average. Production of beet and cane sugar in the continental United States is indicated at 2,200,000 tons, compared with 1,800,000 tons in 1945–46. The increase this season is all in beet sugar. Small increases are indicated for Hawaii and Puerto Rico, but the total from the two areas combined probably will be smaller than the prewar average.

In Cuba, information relating to the acreage for harvest, growing conditions, and an early start of the campaign, indicated a production of about 5,000,000 short tons which would be about 12 percent more than in 1945–46. In the Dominican Republic and the British West Indies production prospects are also more favorable than in the previous season.

Production of sugar in South America in 1946–47, indicated at 2,800,000 tons, is about 6 percent larger than in 1945–46 and 16 percent more than the prewar average. Most of the increase occurred in Argentina, Brazil, and British Guiana. Argentina is expected to have some sugar for export in 1947 in contrast to the necessity for imports in recent years. In addition both Cuba and the Dominican Republic are expected to have larger free export quantities of sugar available for South and Central American markets. With the export surplus expected to be produced in Peru, supplies should be more than sufficient for the area as a whole.

For Europe, as a whole, sugar production in 1946–47 is estimated at 7.4 million tons, compared with the wartime low of 5.5 million tons in 1945–46 and the 5-year (1935–39) average of 10.4 million tons. With the exception of Spain's small production of cane sugar all of the output in this area is beet sugar. There was a marked recovery in production this season in the Netherlands, Spain, Italy, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Yugoslavia, and Poland from the unusually low levels of last season. Production in United States, France, Belgium, the Soviet Union, and some of the Balkan countries also shows further improvement. Excluding the United Kingdom, the small 1945 output in Europe resulted in net imports totaling about 700,000 tons in the calendar year 1946, but the improved production prospect this season may reduce somewhat this requirement in 1947. For the United Kingdom the net import requirement in 1946 totaled about 1.5 million tons.

The output of sugar in Africa in 1946–47 is estimated at 1.3 million tons, or about 12 percent more than in 1945–46. A substantial increase in Mauritius was partially offset by a sizable decrease in the Union of South Africa.

In Asia sugar production estimated at 7 million tons in 1946–47 is about the same as in the previous season but 3.8 millions tons less than the 5-year 1935–39 average. Production in India and China is about equal to the prewar output, but there has been very little recovery so far in the important exporting areas of Formosa, the Philippines, and Java, where production was practically eliminated in the course of the war. These three areas are not expected to produce sufficient sugar this season to meet local requirements. Because of the political distribution in Java, no definite information is available as to the extent of stocks available there. If sizable stocks should become available in 1947, they would be useful in meeting the deficit occurring in the middle-eastern and far-eastern countries, which were formerly good markets of Javanese sugar.

No improvement in the production prospect in Oceania is indicated for 1946–47. An increase in production in the Fiji Islands was about offset by a reduction in Australia.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. PACE. In order to avoid any misunderstanding I believe that the problem of a 15-pound increase to the American housewife carries with it a pretty big "if." That is to say, if the increase this year is one and one-half million tons more than last year.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is right and, it is based on a large Cuban sugar crop. Of course, that is one of the reasons why I insisted earlier in the day and brought up the question that no allocation should be made beyond the first quarter. I mentioned earlier in my remarks that the Secretary had said that would be the policy so far as he is concerned.

Mr. PACE. But the Secretary is not ready to give us assurance that increase will take place?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I do not know whether he can anticipate what is going to happen in April, May, or March as far as sugar production is concerned. No one will know what the total sugar supply will be until at least the latter part of April.

Mr. PACE. Let me say that it is a pleasure to work with the gentleman from Minnesota in order to try to develop the facts and get every possible pound.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. It has always been a pleasure to me to work with the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LEFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LEFEVRE. If we can increase the production a million and a half tons, will that bring the total for the United States to better than 7,000,000 tons for 1947?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. It will bring it up to between six and seven million tons, very close to 7,000,000 tons.

Mr. LEFEVRE. I understood we needed around 7,500,000 tons.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. It will not quite bring it up to that amount. That may be one reason why we will still be short and possibly there may be a continuation of some form of allocation and rationing.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Will the gentleman state for the benefit of the House and for my particular interest, representing one of the sugar-producing areas of Louisiana, whether or not the Secretary of Agriculture indicated in his conference with the gentleman this morning what he anticipated domestic production will be for 1947?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Of cane sugar?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Cane and beet.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Well, the figures as given out by the Department contemplate 451,500 short tons of cane sugar and approximately 1,550,000 tons of beet sugar, raw value.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Adding to what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILL], said about the problems confronting the beet industry, I should like to point out that the grave problem confronting the cane industry in Louisiana at this time is not only labor and machinery, but fertilizer. I hope the Secretary is cognizant of that fact.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will try to impress it upon the Secretary and his associates to see that the sugar-beet growers and the sugarcane growers get an adequate supply of fertilizer.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. May I say that I also appreciate the opportunity of working with the gentleman.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. JONKMAN. Did the gentleman at this morning's conference ascertain from the Secretary of Agriculture what percentage of the Cuban crop for 1946 was allocated to the United States and what percentage to foreign shippers, and also how does that compare with 1941?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I cannot give the gentleman the figure for 1941, but I can state how the division was made last year. Out of a Cuban crop of 4,476,000 tons we received 2,125,000 short-tons, which was less than half of the Cuban crop. What it will be this year when the Cuban production is up to 5,500,000 tons, and even up to 6,000,000 tons, is problematical. We are trying to get that extra amount for the American people.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. In addition to the well-advertised fact that there has been a disproportionate amount of sugar exported overseas during the past year, I wonder whether or not the gentleman has satisfied himself as to the manner in which the sugar which has been consumed domestically has been distributed and divided as between commercial and family use?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. We will no doubt go into that. Our committee was just created today and it is something that should be gone into.

Mr. MUNDT. I am sure that it will show some rather startling disparities from the standpoint of the matter in which this sugar which we do have is made available to the American people.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I think you will find many startling things if this investigation can go forward the way it should.

Mr. MUNDT. Just let me say that I am sure it will go forward under the able leadership of my neighbor from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. MERROW. Did I understand the gentleman to say that in his opinion if there were a proper allocation of the supplies of sugar already available, that the American people could have more per capita during this present year than they had during the last year?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I have suggested an increase of 15 pounds per capita due to increased production.

Mr. MERROW. Just one more question I want to ask. In order to bring about that proper allocation, is it necessary to have mandatory legislation on the part of Congress in order to get the Government agencies to do it?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Well, they may hold that the House of Representatives has nothing to do with that, seeing that this distribution is an international matter. It may be in the nature of a treaty over which we would have no control. But we might indicate very strongly in Congress, by resolution or otherwise, what we thought should be done for the benefit of the American people.

Mr. MERROW. I hope the gentleman introduces the resolution.

Mr. SCHWABE of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SCHWABE of Missouri. Would the gentleman give us a little clearer idea of just how long we are committed to this international food set-up?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am sorry I cannot. If it is part of the United Nations organization, as has been indicated, that is supposed to last quite a few years, as I understand it.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. PACE. I think it might be timely to place in the RECORD the fact that sugar is now and has been, for a number of years past, an international commodity.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is right.

Mr. PACE. That is, there is a combination, namely, the United States and Great Britain, that buys the Cuban sugar crop under agreement that they will equitably distribute it among the consuming nations of the world. It is an international commodity itself, and necessarily must be.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. So I will say that cotton is international, too, and I assume that this International Food Council will discontinue its functions when supplies in the world become adequate so that people generally can buy sugar without any allocation.

Mr. PACE. I am not sure what the Cuban yield will be.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Sugar is primarily international because the Congress made it that way through approving a sugar act which allocates the sugar market in the United States to certain sellers of sugar, and in thus allocating the market the Congress by that act said to you, and you, and you, "There is no need for you to build a sugar plant in the United States and grow sugar beets and sugarcane because if you do you will not have any place to sell your sugar." Now, the people in this country are getting sick and tired relying on an international agreement which denies the housewives of this country the sugar they want with which to preserve and produce the food to go into lunch baskets to feed their working husbands and their children, and that is what we need to clean up.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I know the gentleman has stated the facts correctly, and we might help clean it up by encouraging abundant production of sugar in the United States, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is right.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. So that we will have enough to take care of the needs of the American people.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I would like to give you just one illustration. At the present moment we are probably producing, in the territory with which I am more familiar in Colorado, not over 150,000 acres of sugar beets, and in times gone by we have produced as high as 240,000 acres of sugar beets.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I think you could probably produce 1,000,000 acres of sugar beets if you were given the proper incentive.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. In looking for a direct remedy, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] has suggested, in certain quarters in the State Department there is a desire, or they have found that they can encourage that desire to have sugar all over the world from us. Do you not think the Director should cut down that personnel that has that tremendous desire in the State Department?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will say to the gentleman I think the personnel of all agencies in the Government could be cut at least 50 percent without injuring any of the essential services that the Government is supposed to provide for the people.

Mr. CHURCH. I think that is one of the direct remedies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JENSEN). The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is a fact, I may say to my friend from Illinois, that the State Department takes the categorical position that we shall not allocate to the people of the continent and our off-shore areas under the United States flag a greater percentage of our market, but that we shall allocate a greater percentage to foreign countries. Wherein is there any inducement to you or me or the other fellow to invest our savings in sugar plants in this country or elsewhere under the American flag?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not true that there is a very considerable acreage now devoted to crops of which we are going to have a surplus, that should be devoted to the growing of sugar, of which there is a positive shortage?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. There is no question about that. There may be a remedy for the situation. The land in the surplus areas, such as the potato areas, corn areas, and wheat areas, where they can grow sugar beets, could be made available for sugar production to make the American people self-sustaining in that respect.

May I say in conclusion that many of you will receive and have received scores of letters from your constituents and others who want you to get more sugar for them. It will be the purpose of our committee to recommend and have initiated policies that will bring about an increased sugar supply to the American home. In addition, our job will be, as I see it, to secure increased production of sugar for the future, so that we can get away from this dependency upon foreign production.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. I wonder if the gentleman will not concur with me in this statement, that the committee is convinced that the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Anderson, is concerned about the welfare of the American producers and is doing his best to protect their interests.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I certainly will subscribe to that. As I said earlier, I feel that we have the wholehearted cooperation of the Secretary of Agriculture, who I know is interested. If he is given the authority by those who formulate policies higher up we will not have any difficulty in getting more sugar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STEVENSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

ERADICATION OF CANCER, POLIO, RHEUMATIC FEVER, AND OTHER DEGENERATIVE DISEASES THROUGH GOVERNMENT COOPERATION

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill to provide for the mobilization of the scientific resources and knowledge of the United States for the purpose of seeking the causes and cure of cancer, poliomyelitis, and other degenerative diseases of mankind.

The bill provides, among other things:

That in order to secure the full development and application of the Nation's scientific and technical resources for the national health and welfare, there is hereby established in the executive branch of the Government an independent agency to be known as the National Medical Research Foundation (hereinafter referred to as the "Foundation").

The Foundation is authorized and directed to initiate, conduct, and support scientific research with respect to the cause and cure of cancer, poliomyelitis, rheumatic fever, Bright's disease, asthma, arthritis, leukemia, encephalitis, arteriosclerosis, aplastic anemia, rheumatic heart disease, diabetes, and other degenerative diseases of the human race.

The powers and duties of the Foundation shall be exercised by a governing board (hereinafter called the "Board") of four members, consisting of the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, a representative of the American Medical Association to be nominated by said association, and a representative of the American Cancer Society to be nominated by said society, and a member of the American Heart Association to be nominated by said association. The members of the Board shall serve without compensation, but shall be allowed actual and necessary traveling expenses, and the expenses of subsistence (or a per diem in lieu thereof) when engaged, away from home, in the duties of their office.

Section 6 of the bill provides an appropriation to enable the Foundation to carry out its powers and duties in the amount of $10,000,000 annually, to remain available until expended.

Private research suffers from the crippling restrictions of lack of sufficient funds and scientific equipment. With groups of scientists working together and with many such groups stationed in a number of centers throughout the country and supplied with the best and most advanced instruments and equipment, the cooperation of these brains and scientific equipment, with their consequent exchange of ideas and plans, will advance research immeasurably. The program contemplated under the provisions of this bill will draw together the talent and energy which the problem of eradication of degenerative diseases demands. In order to accomplish this we must assure scientists and the keenest brains of the medical world a decent and an assured income and the most modern scientific laboratories in which to carry out their research programs.

To find the cause and cure for degenerative diseases the Government must become a partner in such research, and thus make it possible to abandon the inadequate methods of prewar medical research, and adopt in their place modern methods such as was used in the discovery of the atomic bomb.

Considering the vast mortality from degenerative diseases in this country, assistance from the Government is an absolute necessity.

The purpose of this bill is to make possible the cooperation of the best scientific and medical brains of the country and the construction of research laboratories and institutions throughout the United States, equipped with the most modern scientific machinery and apparatus, where the keenest brains of the world may carry on independent research, with one purpose and determination in mind—the establishment of the cause of and to discover a cure for degenerative diseases.

Mr. Speaker, one American dies from cancer every 3 minutes, 20 every hour. It is estimated by the American Cancer Society that there are now 500,000 people who have cancer, and that 17,000,000 of those who are alive today will eventually die from that dread disease. In other words, one out of every eight of our population who are now living will die from cancer; and, more tragically, cancer deaths are increasing year by year. In 1900 the number of deaths from cancer was ninth, and today it is second on the list. Only heart disease kills more people annually than cancer. One hundred and seventy-five thousand people die from cancer every year.

In World War II 273,000 American boys died in action. In 1942, 1943, and 1944 approximately 500,000 Americans died from cancer. Between Pearl Harbor and VJ-day cancer killed 607,000 Americans, more than twice the number killed by our enemies in the war. It is the greatest killer of women between the ages of 35 and 55, and the second greatest killer of men. Approximately 2,000 children die from cancer yearly.

According to a Gallup poll, 87 percent of the people of the United States have indicated their approval of scientific research at the expense of the Government to find ways and means for preventing or curing cancer; and 72 percent of the people of this country went on record as being personally willing to pay additional taxes to provide funds for research. Approval of a scientific research program to discover the cause and cure of degenerative diseases was found among all major groups of our people, American men and women of all ages and levels of society, ranging from 82 to 91 percent. More than three out of every four persons in all groups in this country indicated their willingness to pay higher taxes personally in order to be assured of scientific research to find the cure for degenerative diseases under Government supervision, such as is provided in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard from people and institutions from all parts of the country, and from every State, including insurance companies, veterans' organizations, farmers' organizations, women's groups, physicians and surgeons, who approve and endorse this bill, which would provide a foundation to conduct and support scientific research to find a cure for cancer, infantile paralysis, rheumatic fever, rheumatic heart disease, and other degenerative diseases.

We all know the ravages caused by infantile paralysis which has been raging throughout every state in the Union during the past years. In my own State of Wisconsin, 50,000 children were stricken with infantile paralysis during 1946. Epidemics of poliomyelitis have been plaguing every community in our nation from time out of mind.

Infantile paralysis is a disease which is an increasing menace to public health because of the increasing frequency of epidemics with an increasing death rate throughout the United States. Hardly a single community has escaped an epidemic of severe intensity. About 80 percent of the cases are children below 15 years of age but the disease may attack people of all ages.

Experience has shown us and has proved that infantile paralysis has not been conquered by the usual endowments and foundations and March-of-Dimes drives established in this country for that purpose. There have not been sufficient funds provided to make it possible to assemble a sufficient number of scientists and medical men and women to make the concentrated attack that is necessary to wipe out this scourge of the human race.

With réference to rheumatic fever and rheumatic heart disease, I am told by experts in heart diseases that rheumatic fever is a disease that attacks various organs of the body, particularly the heart, joints, blood vessels, the skin, and the brain, and that death or permanent disability occurs in many cases because the majority of patients who may have recovered from the acute attack of rheumatic fever have permanent heart damage, leaving them with the so-called rheumatic heart diseases.

This disease usually attacks infants and young people. At the House of the Good Samaritan in Boston, members of the faculty of the Harvard Medical School followed the cases of 1,000 children who had been stricken with rheumatic fever for a period of 10 years. They found that at the end of 10 years 203 of the 1,000 children were dead, and of those who survived, 135 were so incapacitated they were forced to lead sedentary lives; 209 could not participate in any competitive sports, and of the 1,000 children studied only 439 could lead a normal existence. These scientists also state it is expected that further mortality and disability would occur among these children in the period after the first 10 years following the attack of rheumatic fever.

Dr. O. Hendley of Philadelphia states that the life expectancy of individuals with rheumatic fever or rheumatic heart disease is less than 35 years in contrast to a life expectancy of 64 years for the general population.

Mr. Speaker, the magnitude of the problem of rheumatic fever is great. These diseases are the commonest cause of death of children between 5 and 19 years of age, and the second commonest cause of death of those between 19 and 24 years of age. In New York City the number of deaths from rheumatic fever and rheumatic heart disease is 5 times as great as the combined total of deaths of six common reportable diseases.

Rheumatic fever was prevalent among the members of the armed services during World War II. In the Army and Navy and in the Air Services thousands of cases of rheumatic fever developed.

The funds which have been made available through endowment and private subscriptions for reseach into rheumatic fever and rheumatic heart disease to date have been comparatively small. These funds have not been adequate even to start research study along the lines of rheumatic fever. Funds that have been allocated to the various States for these diseases have been almost entirely used in programs for the care of rheumatic patients and not for research purposes. During the war the large number of cases of rheumatic fever developing in the Army, Navy, and air services required the expenditure of huge sums of money used entirely for the care of patients who were members of the armed services.

At a recent meeting of the American Heart Association the following resolution was adopted:

This conference is strongly in favor of the extension of public programs supported by Federal funds for the study, prevention, and treatment of rheumatic fever and rheumatic heart disease.

Sufferers from rheumatic fever are predominantly among the lower income groups. The investment of Government funds annually to establish the Foundation provided for in this bill will repay the taxpayers of the United States manyfold. Rheumatic fever and rheumatic heart disease are serious public-health problems. They deserve adequate attention and the concentrated scientific effort of the best brains of this country to find a cure therefor.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on for hours, describing the ravages of all the degenerative diseases.

The key to success in the discovery of the cure of the degenerative diseases through scientific and medical research can be brought about through large-scale cooperative research by physicians, chemists, biologists, and other scientists, just as this was the key to the success in the discovery of the atomic bomb by the Manhattan Engineering District. The discovery of the cure of degenerative diseases is no more impossible than was the development of the atomic bomb. The outstanding results accomplished by organized research on atomic energy prove that this country has the facilities to make degenerative and so-called incurable diseases as rare as is typhoid fever and diphtheria today. With the funds and scientific "know-how," and the cooperation of the best scientific and medical brains of this country, miracles can be accomplished in the discovery of the cure for degenerative diseases, just as was accomplished in less than 2½ years under pressure of war in the atomic field. Medical science and research can profit from the new techniques and the tools developed in atomic research, with the aid of the brains and energy of many of our scientific experts who contributed to the medical part of the Manhattan project.

To continue to attempt to find a cure for cancer, poliomyelitis, rheumatic fever, and other degenerative diseases through present-day methods of striving to interest philanthropic foundations and charitable-minded individuals to finance such research by the usual method of contributions is not adequate to solve the problem. What is needed in order to find a cure for these dread diseases is a sustained attack, enlisting the best scientific and medical brains of this country. The efforts of a cooperative force of brains and government funds, forming a research foundation as provided in this bill, will bring together the talent and the energy necessary to find the cure for these diseases. Research of this kind demands that this Government adopt similar methods as were used in the discovery of atomic energy. The vast multitude suffering from these diseases makes it absolutely necessary that the Government get back of a program of this nature. With the cure of degenerative diseases as its goal, and a foundation set up and backed by the United States Government with funds appropriated by this Congress to carry out the program, I have no doubt we will find the scientific and medical brains to solve the problems and provide the cures for all degenerative diseases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JENSEN). Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, in all the confusing statements about the Budget, just one thing is apparent to every one who has studied the Budget far enough so that they understand it and that is that the Budget message of the President is so confusing and so mixed up that almost everyone has been misled into statements that are not in the least correct. This has come from a failure of the President and the Budget to realize that the only way to set up a budget is to set it up in the same way that the appropriation bills are set up and to keep the Government accounting in that same way. Unless that is done we are going to have continual confusion. It is impossible to take the daily Treasury statement and make anything out of it because of the confused manner in which it is set up. I am hopeful that this picture can be corrected so that the thing can be done on a businesslike basis by the time the next Budget is presented.

The facts with reference to the President's Budget are these: The President has submitted budget estimates for appropriations covering $31,276,000,000. That appears on page M14 of the Budget message. There is concealed in the Budget estimate a proposal to transfer illegally upward of $400,000,000. One hundred and fifty million dollars from the Naval Stock Fund and the Naval Clothing and Small Stores Fund and $250,000,000 from the RFC.

There are also contract authorizations totaling over $1,000,000,000.

Many people have called the table of proposed expenditures for 1948, which aggregates $37,500,000,000, the Budget. That is merely the President's statement of what he expects the Government will spend. Part of that $37,500,000,000, perhaps twenty-five or twenty-six billion dollars, would be made up, if the President's budget were allowed, out of the appropriations that will be made this year and the other part, from the ten or twelve billion dollars, out of the balances remaining available to departments for expenditure out of funds previously appropriated. My understanding is that these appropriated and authorized but unexpended items will aggregate as of next July 1, if no rescissions are made, something like fifteen or sixteen billion dollars. They are items that have been appropriated without year. They are items that have been appropriated and the money contracted for the construction of airplanes, ships, buildings, dams, and almost every conceivable form of governmental activity. This explains the difference between the Budget and the estimate of expenditures.

I have asked for, and expect immediately, a schedule of the funds available to the departments and agencies and unexpended as of January 1. I will then immediately expect the Appropriations Committee to start hearings on the rescissions of every dollar not needed for the welfare of the Government. I would be unable to make an estimate of how much would be rescinded. On the other hand, I know that many hundreds of millions of dollars should be available for rescission.

With reference to the amount that should be spent by the armed forces, I give this little illustration, just to indicate that the President's proposed expenditures and proposed 1948 figures are not well thought out. Resulting from the drop in number of Army personnel of an average of 365,000, we have a nonrecurring item of $1,095,000,000, which unquestionably can be cut out of the budget. On the basis of current expenditures and requirements, we should have a balance of at least $300,000,000 out of the present year's appropriations of $7,468,000,000. The expenditures for this current fiscal year, for the first 6 months, were $3,735,000,000, just half of the appropriated amount. With a reduction, which will average $50,000,000 a month on account of personnel pay below the figures for the first half of the year, it shows that unquestionably they should have a balance of $300,000,000 this year.

As a result of the reduction of personnel alone the budget for next year should not under any circumstances, without considering any other item, exceed $6,073,000,000. That is a mathematical operation which is perfectly clear.

There are many other items in the War Department budget of the same character and there is no question but what we can make substantial cuts in the Army and the Navy appropriations without hurting national defense. That is the last thing I would want to do. I might say to you that I have served upon committees which have had charge of appropriations for these departments for 23 consecutive years and I have a rather intimate knowledge of what their requirements are.

In the Navy, a like situation with reference to personnel exists. But besides that there is too big a set-up for shore stations and too many of them. There is too much tendency to build new structures at this time. Much money has been wasted the last year in that way and it has interfered with the efforts that would otherwise have resulted in increased housing for our people. The needs of the Navy for ships in commission, numbers of ships, and numbers of planes, and all that sort of thing must be determined by the international picture. It might very well be that between the time of the presentation of this Budget and the conclusion of the hearings the international situation might be such that we could go a long way. On the other hand we have all got to recognize that if it goes the other way we have to do likewise.

At the end of the war with Japan, practically all of the military instruments of war, such as guns, planes, tanks, shells, and that sort of thing were obsolete, both as a result not only of the inventions of our own people but also as a result of the experiments which were taken over. At the present time our activities along that line are in a state of flux. We must proceed with our developments and we must proceed with the creation of new weapons and of new explosives, so that we may keep the United States ahead of all the rest of the world from a scientific standpoint as to airplanes, guns, ammunition, and everything else. On the other hand we must coordinate our operations so that we will avoid as much duplication as possible. I have already started a coordination set-up which I believe will be effective in preventing the duplication of Army and Navy experiments and development but also prevent either one of these agencies with competing with the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics. In the meantime, we should not produce too many things that will be obsolete before completion.

Just so we may have a picture of some of the civilian activities of Government and what has been presented to us, I call your attention to the estimate for the Federal Communications Commission, an increase in personnel from 892 in Washington to 1,068, 25 percent, and enormous quantities of money; the Federal Power Commission from 588 to 625; the Federal Trade Commission from 523 to 802; the Interstate Commerce Commission from 1,629 to 1,793; the National Archives from 373 to 469; the National Labor Relations Board from 483 to 797. These are just samples. I shall on Thursday expect a place in the RECORD for a breakdown of my comments on the personnel set-up. The President only proposes a reduction from our present 2,300,000 to about 2,089,000 of civilian employees. Most of that cut comes in the War and Navy Departments and there is an increase in almost every other agency. The net increase in other agencies is 40,000 employees. One of the worst offenders is the Department of Commerce, which has a set-up of an increase from $156,000,000 to $199,000,000 over-all, with an increase in personnel of enormous proportions—over 25 percent. This is absolutely unconscionable.

The Department of Interior is given an increase from $259,000,000 to $295,000,000. It even proposes the setting up of regional offices to take over certain departmental activities without doing away with the set-up for the Department.

I have been over the appropriations requested. I am satisfied that the figure which I have given heretofore, $29,000,000,000 is a top figure for appropriations. In other words, I am satisfied that the President's $32,000,000,000 Budget can be cut to $29,000,000,000. In making up my figures I have allowed $2,500,000,000 margin for deficiencies and for things that perhaps we should be unable to keep to my estimates. I shall not go into the details of my proposals until we come before the House with a resolution for a legislative budget, and until we reach the items in the appropriations bills. I believe that by rescissions and by the proper trimming of the 1948 Budget estimates of $32,000,000,000 we can reduce the spending program for 1948 by from three to four billion dollars.

The most discouraging factor about the President's Budget estimates is this: That he proposes expenditures for the fiscal year 1948 at a rate of $500,000,000 in excess of the expenditures for the first half of 1947.

Let us get that situation straight in our minds. The expenditures for the first half of this fiscal year from July 1, 1946, to December 31, 1947, were $18,487,000,000. Twice that amount is a little less than $37,000,000,000. In other words, if we went on the next year as we have done during the first half of this fiscal year we will spend $37,000,000,000 and he is carrying in his estimates $37,500,000,000—a proposed increase over the rate that we are going now. In addition to that, with the $37,000,000,000 spent, with the expenditures going at the rate of less than $18,500,000,000 for the first half of this year, he is proposing that we have an over-all expenditure for this fiscal year, up to the 30th of next June, of $42,000,000,000. What does that mean? It means he would be spending $5,000,000,000 more in the last half of this present fiscal year than he spent in the first half of this fiscal year. To my mind that is unconscionable and intolerable. There is absolutely no reason why we should not keep the expenditures of this fiscal year down to the estimated revenue of $40,000,000,000. We really should be $3,000,000,000 below that. From what examination I have been able to make of the Treasury situation, I believe that $40,000,000,000 of revenue is a low estimate rather than a high one. With expenditures of the first half of 1947 running $18,487,000,000, he tells us on page M14 that he thinks the expenditures for the fiscal year 1947 will be $42,523,000,000. This means increasing expenditures from January to June by $5,536,000,000 over the expenditures from July to December in the present fiscal year. I wonder if the people of the United States like that kind of economy. I wonder if the people of the United States like the idea of increasing expenditures for the last half of this year by about $5,000,000,000 over the first half of the year.

It is about time for us to begin to cut down and reduce. There is no reason under heaven why the Budget should not be balanced this year with estimated receipts of $40,000,000,000. One may go through almost every agency of the Government and find plenty of people unnecessarily employed sitting at their desks without enough activity to make them alert. That situation must be stopped and it can only be stopped by a reduction in our Federal pay rolls.

That reduction will be in the interest of the Federal employees because the reduction will make them more active, more alert, and more valuable to themselves and to the Government.

Opportunities are going to be presented to the Congress to reduce this staggering budget and the terrific estimate of expenditures. A public debt of $260,000,000,000, direct and indirect, and of $300,000,000,000 of potential obligations, demands reduction. The economy of the country demands that taxes be placed on a basis where the people can have some incentive to go out and produce. The only way it can be accomplished is by our having courage enough to say to the bureaucrats "you have got to clean house," and that is what I propose that the Members of this House shall have an opportunity to vote on.

The elected Representatives of the people must and will take charge of the spending of the people's money.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the committee planned to look into the spending for the last half of the fiscal year 1946–47?

Mr. TABER. Absolutely. We have got to do that.

Mr. ROBSION. May I state this: Some of the Members on the floor recall that when the Republicans took charge in 1919 we reviewed the appropriations that had been made and cut down, I think, a little more than a billion dollars. I think that can be done at this time.

Mr. TABER. I think we can cut out much more than a billion dollars.

Illustrative of the way they are dragging, I have before me a memorandum that was handed me this morning. Fifteen thousand five hundred employees on the pay roll of the OPA today, nine-tenths of them with nothing to do. Twenty-two publicity agents in the main office of the OPA—not in the rent-control set-up, but in the main office of that set-up. That is just a sample of the way we are being treated by the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Will it not be necessary for us, if we want to keep this country solvent, to do away with some of the functions of Government that are costing a great deal more than they are actually worth to the American people?

Mr. TABER. We should certainly do away with every possible activity of the Government that is not in the interest of the public.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN], a few minutes ago, indicated that a great many of the personnel in one of the departments had found a way to get sugar to so many people in other countries. Everybody wants sugar. Apparently they are being encouraged to eat more and more sugar and candy. Does not the gentleman think that one of the direct ways of cutting down that encouragement of that desire to take this sugar away from the American people and give it to people who have not been used to it at all, is to cut down the number of personnel in that department which encourages that desire?

Mr. TABER. I think that set-up in a governmental department which has been handing out our money without a fresh, clean appropriation—that is lend-lease—should be wound up and wound up immediately. I do not think we ought to allow that to go any longer. If we are going to provide relief for foreign countries, we should do it by direct action, and know what we are doing, and not have any more of this wiggling and twisting around to cover up what is going on.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. The very able gentleman from New York has just pointed out that these reductions in personnel would help the employees themselves. Does not the gentleman feel that many thousands of these employees have become indolent because of their being in a position of little or nothing to do and thereby wasting the taxpayers' money as well as their time—setting a low standard and poor example—because they are in a position of sitting around doing nothing? In Chicago in some of the War Assets set-up I have seen those people wasting their time day after day. They cannot but set a bad example to the people who ought to be working instead of loafing in this country.

Mr. TABER. I would not be able to answer that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHAFER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three separate instances.

Mr. KNUTSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a radio address he delivered the other day and also a newspaper editorial.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE BUDGET

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, in support of the rather vigorous budget statement by my esteemed chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], indulge me for a little while I belabor the subject from a different angle. A budget should be built from the bottom up and not by just cheese paring from the top down.

When the President announced to the country and to the Congress that the over-all for authorizations, estimates, and otherwise, resulted in a budget for the fiscal year 1948, which begins on July 1 of this year, will in round numbers be $37,500,000,000, it was quite difficult to believe by those who have been giving some thought to it. That was three times the Budget of 1940, and four times the Budget of 1939.

Let it not be forgotten that hostilities came to an end a long time ago, and for all practical purposes we should be considering a peacetime budget similar to the last peacetime year prior to World War II.

Let me say to the Members of the House that we have a very special responsibility in the matter and we cannot pass the buck. When the Legislative Reorganization Act was passed, it contained a provision in section 138 that required a joint committee of the two spending committees and the two revenue committees of the House and Senate to examine the President's estimate, to counsel and to confer, and then to strike a ceiling on expenditures. Now that word "ceiling" is not new. Somehow it has ingratiated itself into the nomenclature of the country until every man and woman and child is quite familiar with it; and I say that our responsibility now under the legislative budget provision of the Reorganization Act is to provide a ceiling on expenditures, making due allowance for deficiencies, and to gear it to the estimated revenues. We ought to be clear and we ought to refresh ourselves on that section of the act, because it is not permissive, it is not a thing we can do if we want to and put aside if we do not want to; it is a thing that we are directed to do. This joint committee of Congress is required to come in with a ceiling, to include it in recommendations in a report, to bring in a concurrent resolution, and to do it all by the 15th of February 1947. So that is our responsibility.

There will be no buck passing on this budget proposition to the President of the United States. The fine art of buck passing that started way back in the Garden of Eden will not work. You will remember when the Lord chastised Adam he took refuge in an excuse, and he said: "The woman Thou gavest me didst give me of the fruit of the tree and I didst eat." Then you will remember that Eve said she was urged to eat of the fruit by the serpent the Lord put into the garden. I have often thought that perhaps that incident ought to be modified a little bit, that it was too bad the serpent did not have someone to pass the buck to. But there is no question here of any buck passing; it will not do. You cannot say that that was Harry Truman's budget, because when we get through, it will be our responsibility and once more we shall become the custodians of the public purse. So when you go home and make your accounting of your stewardship with the folks in your constituency you must stand up and be counted on expenditures. It will be our responsibility.

But more than that, it has an extraordinary sense of responsibility about it because of what happened on an eventful day which will be inscribed in red letters on the calendar as November 5, 1946. People are expecting things. You remember we went before the people with a campaign on many issues about confusion and about communism in high places and about corruption, waste, and extravagance. So, now, people are expecting things and if we fail in our responsibility, if they shall be frustrated and disillusioned, that is going to be our headache too. It will not do for the congressional mountain to labor and bring forth an economy mouse.

You know, this is a good time to talk about fiscal affairs. On Saturday last a great American's birth anniversary was observed. It was Alexander Hamilton. He was only 33 years of age when he sat in the Constitutional Convention, then later became a great Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. His statue stands down here on Pennsylvania Avenue. It is refreshing once in a while to look upon the finely chiseled features of that great fiscal adviser who felt that solidarity at the base of government in the form of sound finances was the best guaranty of freedom. So, because we observe his birth anniversary in January, it is a good time, you know, to reexamine our own responsibilities.

Let me say to you that until our budget problem is solved, until our esteemed chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and his committee can get this matter solved, why talk about debt reduction and why talk about tax reduction? First, we must know what we are going to spend. If we spend more than we take in, any tax reduction to which we devote ourselves will only increase the unbalance in the Budget. You see, you come right back to this question of spending. Why talk about reducing the debt until we find out what our going expenditures for all purposes will be? There is no virtue in talking about it until we get back to it. So we revert to this question of the Budget and, may I express my profound admiration for the tenacity and for the vigor with which the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has devoted himself to this whole question.

There is a moral approach to it also. There is no magic in a figure. There is no magic in thirty-seven billion or forty billion of forty-one billion or nineteen billion. Why, the late President of the United States proved that there was no magic in a figure, for when the time came to devalue the dollar he reached up into the air, according to Mr. Morgenthau's chronological biography, and seized the figure 21 and said it should be 21 percent because 21 was 3 times 7 and that is a very lucky number. John, I was going to say to you, maybe we ought to reach up and take 21. Maybe we ought to take twenty-one billion instead of thirty-seven and one-half billion, and at long last bring some comfort and some assurance to the taxpayers of the country who have been carrying this load so long.

Mr. TABER. Kind of a 7-come-11 game?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me point out how important this thing is and how explosive and dangerous our fiscal problems can be. Has it ever occurred to you that the national debt reflected in the last Treasury statement is 180 percent of the national income? That is a pretty big obligation for good, sound management in times of economic reversal, in times when the forces are not moving very fluidly and so well in the economic stream of the country, and you have a debt two hundred and sixty-seven thousand million dollars to look at, because it may rise up one day in a weak moment when the inhibitions are down to plague us and to threaten the financial integrity of the United States of America. Let us not forget it. So that adds then to what I regard as something of a sacred responsibility because we are the custodians and trustees for 141,000,000 American people, and if through lack of courage or mismanagement or maladministration on our part the economy starts going into the proverbial handbasket then, of course, we will all be running for cover. But we will be doing something more. There will be men stand up on this floor when that time comes and say, "Mr. Speaker, I believe more power ought to be delegated to someone high in office, without spelling it out too closely or placing any restrictions on it, and I believe more power ought to be delegated to some Moses to lead us out of the wilderness," and then you are walking a dangerous and twisted, tortuous path that leads to what a great British economist called the road to serfdom. I adjure you, this is the most important thing with which Congress is going to deal.

In the first place, our problem is to unloose the creative energies of the country, but we have got to give a man a chance to keep a little of what he makes. So you get back to taxes, you get back to expenditures, and then you get back to the whole fabric of confidence which involves this question of debt. So I say, that is the moral approach. The way to reduce is to reduce. The way to cut is to sharpen up your trusted jackknife and cut, and cut deep.

Let me say especially for those fine new Members who have come into the Eightieth Congress for the first time, that from the list of people who have been skilled in coaxing money out of Congress year after year, you will hear all the reasons in the book why you cannot cut. You cannot do this and you cannot do that. This function is sacred and that function is sacrosanct, and so profane hands must not be laid upon them. I say to you, as a good rule of thumb, just make up your mind what is imperative as distinguished from what is desirable. I could think of the most beautiful ways to spend the money of the taxpayers that you ever saw or was ever put on paper. Why, I could reach up into my imagination right now and out of the recesses of memory find ways of spending several billion dollars that I think would be highly desirable; it would be lovely; it probably would expand the enjoyment of living for people, but the question is, Is it imperative in a dangerous hour when our debt is $267,000,000,000, and it represents 180 percent of one whole year of national income? So, use the rule of thumb, Is it imperative? Make that the rule and then it will not be so difficult to put the ax where it belongs.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I wonder if the gentleman could not underscore the importance of the $267,000,000,000 by recalling to mind the fact that a very talkative, although not a very talented, Secretary of the Treasury by the name of Morgenthau one time said that if the national debt ever exceeded $67,000,000,000, he would wash his hands of any of the future integrity of the country. He exceeded that by $200,000,000,000.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right. The other day a friend of mine out in my home country quibbed a little sentence out of a house organ that is published in Cleveland, Ohio, I think it is called the Latch String, and the sentiment that he put on a post card was this:

> Stay on the job and pay your taxes. The boys in the bureaus and in Washington are counting on you.

Now, let us be sure that the folks back home will not count in vain when they count on us and say "Let the ax go deep." I suggest that as we go into these Budget deliberations maybe it is well to go back to the fiscal year 1940 and there see what our last peacetime Budget was and then to build from that foundation, and after a while we will probably achieve a firm figure that will be fairly representative of the imperative obligations that we have.

Nineteen hundred and forty was the year when a gentleman by the name of Winston Churchill was the man of the year. Denmark and Norway were already under the Nazi heel. The blitz was on. The Luftwaffe was pasting Coventry and others of those great communities of Great Britain. In that fiscal year of 1940 we got some estimates. We were not at war, because it was 18 months before Pearl Harbor. That fiscal year began on July 1, 1939. We got some estimates from the then President of the United States that aggregated $13,200,000,000. That was $9,700,000,000—and I just use round figures—in the regular estimates, and $3,000,000,000 plus in the supplementary estimates. So for a firm figure, in the peacetime year of fiscal 1940 our estimates and also our appropriations were roughly about thirteen and one-fifth billions.

Now, here is the first real firm peacetime year after World War II, but instead of a Budget of thirteen and one-fifth billions the President of the United States sends in an estimate that is three times that large. I ask you, now, Are we three times better off? That is something that maybe we might well keep in mind as we begin to ladle out the money over which we are trustees and which belongs to the people that are scattered from one end of the country to the other.

What was this Budget for in 1940? It was very, very simple, the 1940 Budget. For regular establishments of Government, $6,500,000,000. That included everything. It included Agriculture. It included $1,600,000,000 for national defense. It included $560,000,000 for the Veterans' Administration. It included the Commerce Department, the Justice Department, Labor, and all the 30-odd independent agencies of the Government. Six billion five hundred million dollars, that was the regular Budget. Then for relief we estimated and appropriated nearly $2,500,000,000. You see, we have no relief in 1948, except to relieve some of these despairing souls, perhaps, who are presently upon the Federal rolls and who are getting ready for the long exodus home, God bless them. Two billion five hundred million dollars for relief. We paid a billion dollars of interest on the national debt. You can believe it or not, we actually made a payment on the principal amounting to $600,000,000. Then there were trust funds of $1,900,000,000, and miscellaneous $700,000,000. It totaled about $13,200,000,000.

That was way back in that ancient period of 1940, the last peacetime year before World War II. Now in this modern day, with the Budget of 1948, you might be interested in percentage-wise figures as to how it is apportioned—30 percent will go to national defense. As a rule of thumb you can say that out of every $100 $30 will go to the defense of this our blessed Republic. International functions, 10 percent; veterans, 20 percent; agriculture, 4 percent; national resources, 3 percent; transportation and communication, 4 percent; general government, 4 percent. Interest—mark you well, interest—interest alone on the national debt will take 13 percent of the whole budget estimated for the fiscal year 1948.

Finally, there is an item of refunds of 6 percent and then there are some general items. So there you have it, sort of broken up, and the question is: At what point in this whole picture can we insert the scalpel and do a fine little job of amputation so that we can get it down to what Senator Huey Long called frying size, that is, manageable size so that you could get it in the frying pan.

There are many items here that will bear the most careful scrutiny. For instance, under national defense there is $530,000,000 for research. Think of it. That is a lot of money for research. Perhaps it is needed. But here is $530,000,000 for military and naval research. To find new and more effective instrumentalities of death with which to kill people in the future. There is $132,000,000 in the defense item for public works. In the international estimate, which will take 10 percent of the budget, there is $1,200,000,000 for the British loan. The Export-Import Bank expects to lend the money of the people of the United States to countries everywhere in the world so the President has estimated $730,000,000 for loans. There is an item of $950,000,000 for foreign relief. Six-hundred-and-fifty-odd-million dollars of that will be administered by the Army. It may be that some agency which will take the place of UNRRA, the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, will be created to spend the other $300,000,000.

I will not analyze the rest of it but will conclude with this thought. It seems to me that if we are going to make a frontal assault on this thing and do a fair, timely and forthright job, perhaps we had just better tear the house down and build it from the bottom up.

What would be the matter with starting with 1940, the last peacetime year? Let us take that figure of $13,200,000,000. First, let us deduct relief. That is $2,500,000,000. That reduces it to $10,700,000,000. Let us take out what we spent for defense that year, which was $1,600,000,000. That brings it down to $9,100,000,000. Let us add $4,000,000,000, because that is the difference in our interest payments between the fiscal year 1948 and 1940. We paid $1,000,000,000 in interest that year. Five billion dollars will be the amount in 1948. So we add $4,000,000,000. That will bring it up to $13,100,000,000. There are $2,000,000,000 of tax refunds to people who have overpaid their taxes and who are entitled to those refunds. It is a commitment. It is nothing over which we have any real control because it is simply restoring to them the money which they paid to the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Therefore, that must be paid back to them. That adds $2,000,000,000, and brings it up to $15,100,000,000.

There you have a base—you not only have the regular expenditures of Government exclusive of Army and Navy expenditures, but you have $2,500,000,000 to pay off on the national debt. You see we are not giving enough attention to this matter of debt reduction. That is gospel with me. We are teaching our GI's to be thrifty. Under the GI legislation we insure loans and expect them to go into the building and loan associations or into the banks and pay back those loans and liquidate the mortgages on their homes, their farms, and their businesses. We urge them to practice thrift. You cannot urge your people to thrift but what you also must indulge in a little thrift yourself as a government. Therefore, something has to be done about starting ourselves on the road toward liquidating the national debt. Mr. Truman stated that by good management at the end of the current year there might be $200,000,000 of surplus to pay off on the national debt. If we pay it back at that rate, it will take 1,300 years. If that time is measured going back in history, it will take you back to the year 600, long before the Crusaders ever thought of moving into the Holy Land. No, it will not be done that way. That is not a proper discharge of our responsibilities. A substantial debt reduction item must be included, in my judgment. So I am including it. All right. Where are we? We have got a rounded budget up to $15,100,000,000. But it does not include veterans and it does not include the Army and Navy. It does not include some of these items that Mr. Truman has in his very astonishing Budget. I bear out my distinguished chairman [Mr. TABER] that there is some confusion in that Budget message. As a matter of fact, I labored on it by lamplight last night, and I wondered if it could be more confusing if they had actually tried to confuse it a little.

So we have got to do a simple thing. You know they tell a story about an old man 80 years old, who was interviewed by the press on his eightieth birthday. After a lot of questions about his life and background, one of them said, "Well, grandpap, I guess you have seen a lot of changes in your time, haven't you?" He said, "Yep, and I have been agin every one of them."

You know, he had a very simple approach to life. You may not agree with him; but you have got to whittle this down to the compass of your own thinking, a little. Think of it as nothing more than a budget exercise in your own household, only squared and cubed and double cubed until it reaches these monumental proportions that are represented by this monumental sum.

So here is a rounded budget now. It is 1940. So we add up the reductions of the committee and we get up to fifteen and one-tenth billion. Now the committees of the Appropriations Committee and also every Member of this Congress must give some attention to how much we shall expend for national defense; how much for the Veterans' Administration. Certainly we regard it as a sacred obligation, but that is no reason why we should be wasteful. It can be sacred, and we can still perform our duty to the boys who marched off in battle. That is no reason why through mismanagement and extravagance and waste and bad tinkerings and processes and lack in the whole administrative set-up, money ought to be thrown away. If we can reduce it, then it is our solemn obligation to reduce it. You will get no credit either in your constituency or in heaven for having wasted money even though for the moment it seems to have been in a good cause.

Here is an estimate of $7,200,000,000 for the Veterans' Administration. Ladies and gentlemen, for years, in company with my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH], who will be chairman of the Independent Offices Appropriations Subcommittee, and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], year after year we would sit down here in a little cubbyhole with the Veterans' Administration, and day after day we would labor with mountains of figures. As late as 1940 that obligation we were meeting was $560,000,000 in a single year. Here in 1948, 8 years later, it is seven and two-tenths billion. So, it has grown. But it is an obligation to men who wore the uniform and in whom some disintegrating seed has been sown. We have got to do the job. Next comes national defense. We all favor a strong defense but let it not be wasteful or extravagant. Look at that research item for instance. Must we spend that much for that item? Certainly we are for national defense. But you know the waste and extravagance that is one of the inevitable incidents of war. I was privileged to take a trip in 1945, all across the world for 90 days, and I poked into a good many things. I saw waste and I saw extravagance. I did not quarrel too much. The grim business of war had to be taken to a successful conclusion. But since sanity has returned now, like good bookkeepers, good accountants, and good public servants, we are going to have to take a little look at it.

Look at that item of international relief. How much shall we spend for relief? We have done pretty well. We gave UNRRA $2,700,000,000 in the last 2 years. Let nobody ever rise up in any far corner of the earth and reproach us for having been niggardly at the expense of human distress; we have not. Then there are lend-lease funds and 30-year loans made by the Export-Import Bank at 2⅜ percent. Way down deep we know pretty well we are not going to get a lot of that money back; we know that now. So we have erred, if anything, on the side of generosity and compassion and charity. But do we lay out this much now in 1948 when we have a problem of our own?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Under the head of natural resources there is an atomic item of $443,000,000. It is a lot of money. You know that is not hay even in my home town, and it is a town of 20,000 people—$443,000,000. Then there is $255,000,000 for War Department civil functions, and $176,000,000 for reclamation. Then there is an interesting item headed "Transportation and communication" that was never there before. They have broken it down functional-wise.

Mr. TABER. Are they getting so they travel a good deal? Is that what it means?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I expect so.

There are $200,000,000 for the Merchant Marine, $300,000,000 for navigation aids, $430,000,000 for highways. Let me tell you an interesting story, because sometime you may get this reaction yourself. Out in the Middle West the president of a large company wrote me several years ago and castigated me as a Member of Congress and particularly as a member of the Appropriations Committee for wild "squandermania," and insisted that something be done about cutting down expenditures. The very mail that brought his letter brought a letter from the vice president of the same company. It was shortly after the action contemplated by this House that estimates for highways which were at that time at $250,000,000 for a single year should be cut in half and the $250,000,000 used over a period of 2 years instead of one. This particular company was interested in the building of equipment that was used in highway construction. So in the same mail that brought the letter from the president of this company castigating me for expenditures, the vice president in charge of sales wrote me because we were not spending enough, for bigger expenditures would mean more equipment on the highways. So I put the president's letter in an envelope and sent it to the vice president, and I put the vice president's letter in an envelope and sent it to the president, without myself writing to either of them. Neither one talked to me for some time, but they are all right now. You see the perspective always changes. But there should be courage about this thing as we move into it because people are going to rise up back home, and in the language of the Scripture, "call you blessed" because they know that what we do in this field is going to be some safeguarding of the essential freedoms of the country.

One other thing, Mr. Speaker, and then I will bring this discourse to an end. It is a rather interesting thing, if this figure is correct, that actually, exclusive of the War and Navy Departments—the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], has already referred to this—we have more civilians on the rolls today than we had on VJ-day. Evidently it takes more to lick, shall I say, our beloved bureaucrats, than it does to lick our enemies. It is an amazing thing, it is a staggering figure, if you please, but on the 30th of November 1946, exclusive of War and Navy, we had 1,296,000 civilians on the rolls. I am not insensible to the fact it takes people to run the Government, but it should not take two people for every job. After all, when the war in which I was a soldier terminated in November of 1918, the top for all personnel purposes was only 917,000. You see, we had gotten way up above 3,000,000 in World War II. Maybe this war was three times bigger, I do not know. It certainly was in point of expenditure, it certainly was in point of the number of people who were upon the civilian rolls.

In the light of all that, fancy coming along and asking for more money for personnel in many agencies than they had in fiscal 1947. Can you imagine what the folks back home will think, particularly in the tenor of that little squib "Stay on the job, boys, pay taxes, the folks in Washington are counting on you."

Let us take that sentiment to heart and let us do our job. Let every man constitute himself a subcommittee of one of the Congress of the United States, because it is our collective duty and our individual responsibility. The buck cannot be successfully passed to another branch of Government because the Constitution put the power of the purse right here.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. May I say to the gentleman from Illinois that his discussion this afternoon and that of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations ought to hearten each and every one of us. It certainly ought to give some assurance to the country that we mean business and that we are going to try to carry out the mandate that was given us on November 5. Since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives the address of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee today has given me more encouragement than I have heard from the chairman of any Appropriations Committee since Mr. Buchanan, of Texas, was here. I believe the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and his associates on that committee have a great responsibility to cut down expenditures—if we give them cooperation, and we can do it if we will make up our minds. I hope that the membership of the House will remember this. Where are you going to get the money to do what you men are talking about?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, this discourse must wind up. I simply reassert and reaffirm to you the text: Let us do a job of building this Budget for 1948 from the bottom up, not by cheese paring from the top down.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

THE BUDGET

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, it has not been possible to call the Budget Committee together because of the fact that the committees have not been made up. It was only on yesterday that the majority side took final action on its selections, and I understand the minority has not yet presented its committees to the House.

Mr. DOUGHTON. What was the inquiry?

Mr. KNUTSON. Have the minority members of the committees been reported to the House?

Mr. DOUGHTON. We are going to be ready to make a report tomorrow so that our work can be passed upon by the House on the following day, if the House is in session.

Mr. KNUTSON. On Thursday. Obviously the Budget Committee cannot be called together until the members of the committees have been named and approved by their respective bodies. It was my thought that we might meet on Friday if by that time the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] had ready an outline of his budget for 1948.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. HALLECK. It was announced earlier today by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FORAND], chairman of the minority conference, that they hoped to be able to present their nominations for the committees on Thursday when we meet at that time.

Mr. KNUTSON. It had been my hope that we would call the Budget Committee together on Friday, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has requested that the call be deferred until Monday. So I will now advise the House that the Budget Committee will be called to meet at 10 o'clock Monday morning, and the members will receive due notice of the meeting place.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

SUGAR

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, during the course of the afternoon we have listened to a very interesting and illuminating discussion on the question of sugar, which is a very important subject to the American people. I take this time to call to the attention of the House the fact that today I have introduced a measure which I hope will solve the sugar problem.

Immediately upon the passage of the bill I have introduced all rationing and all price control of sugar will end. Furthermore, it is provided in the bill that I have introduced that the Government shall get out of the sugar business. I have also asked in my measure that there be appointed by the President a commission of seven, three from the Government and four from the industry, representing wholesalers, retailers, refiners and producers of sugar, and that this commission shall have the power to allocate fairly and equitably all the sugar that is held by the Government. I think that this is necessary if we are to receive more sugar during the present year.

My bill further states that it is the policy of the Congress to curtail shipments of sugar abroad until our own needs have been satisfied. The commission which I propose will have the power to curtail shipments abroad until our own needs have been met. The people expect action on this important matter, and the bill that I have introduced today, if passed by the Congress immediately, will solve the sugar problem.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks the bill which I have introduced today to terminate price controls and rationing in the case of sugar, to terminate Government sugar operations, to authorize the placing of limitations on the exportation of sugar, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

A bill to terminate price controls and rationing in the case of sugar, to terminate Government sugar operations, to authorize the placing of limitations on the exportation of sugar, and for other purposes

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1947

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, we acknowledge that Thou dost govern in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without Thy notice, how can we think Thou art indifferent to what we say and do here?

If this day Thou dost want us to do, or not to do, any particular thing, we pray that Thou wilt make it plain to us, for Thou knowest how blind we can be, and how stubborn, in our own intentions. We pray for Thy help in our thinking and Thy love in our hearts. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 13, 1947, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MARK THISTLETHWAITE

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I deem it an honor, although a sorrowful one, to pay tribute today on the floor of the United States Senate to one of Indiana's great men, the late Mark Thistlethwaite.

It is only fitting that the Senate today observe a moment's silence in respect for a man who for 40 years has been an outstanding figure in the Halls of the Capitol of this great Nation, first as secretary to Vice President Thomas R. Marshall, and then as one of the country's most prominent newspaper reporters.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I had no idea the Senator from Indiana was going to refer to the lamented death of Mark Thistlethwaite, but I should like to utter a sentence or two.

Mr. Thistlethwaite was one of the first newspapermen I met when I came to Washington 24 years ago. Much could be said of him, all of it good. He was a gentleman, he was a scholar, and one of the fairest men in presenting views on anything about which he wrote that I have ever encountered in my lifetime.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE LAWS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I reintroduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relative to marriage and divorce laws. At this time I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the problem of conflicting marriage and divorce laws in this country was recognized as long ago as 1884, when a measure similar to the one I am proposing was first introduced in the Congress. For several years I have continued the movement to secure enactment of this vital legislation.

During World War II it was understood that no action on constitutional amendments would be taken until most of our veterans returned to their homes. The time has come for such action, and I firmly believe this matter should be given prompt consideration and—I trust—early approval.

Mr. President, the Nation was properly shocked last September when the Federal Security Agency released provisional figures on marriages and divorces in 1945. Frankly speaking, the figures are startling. The Federal Security Agency recorded these provisional statistics: 1,618,331 marriages and 502,000 divorces in 1945. In other words, for every three couples that marched to the altar, one wedding ended in the divorce courts.

But let us look at the figures for this year. The Census Bureau estimates that in 1947 there will be nearly 40 percent as many divorces as there are marriages. Are we going to allow this problem to wreck our homes, the very core of civilization and human progress? I am convinced it is one of the greatest dangers confronting the American people today and we must do something about it. After careful study of the problem over a number of years, it is my conclusion that uniform Federal regulation of marriage and divorce laws through a constitutional amendment is necessary to correct the situation. Keeping in mind our responsibility of preserving the institution of the home, I therefore urge the favorable consideration of this resolution.

Mr. President, I wish at this time to introduce for appropriate reference a bill on the same subject. The measure contains a program which might be approved by the Congress following adoption of the constitutional amendment.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 28) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to marriage and divorce laws, introduced by Mr. CAPPER, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 198) to provide for uniform regulation of marriage and divorce, introduced by Mr. CAPPER, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SECONDARY MARKET FOR FARM LOANS

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to authorize the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation to purchase from approved lenders, for cash, loans made under section 502 of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, popularly known as the GI bill of rights. Loans under section 502 of the GI bill are those made to veterans for farming purposes—to purchase lands, buildings, livestock, equipment, machinery, supplies, or implements, or to repair, alter, construct, or improve land, equipment, or buildings, to be used in farming operations conducted by the veteran, or for working capital for the farming operations.

A number of the smaller banks and other local lenders, as well as veterans' organizations, have informed me that many responsible lenders may be unable to make such loans in the volume needed by veterans in their local communities unless the lending agencies have a dependable secondary market where they can sell loans already made to obtain funds for further loans. A secondary market is therefore needed to enable the veterans who require farming loans to obtain such loans from the lenders in their own home communities.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has arranged to provide a secondary market for home loans made to veterans under section 501 of the GI bill. It is felt that the secondary market for veterans' farm loans should be provided by a governmental farm lending agency.

The Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation appears to be the appropriate agency to provide this secondary market for farm loans. The Corporation is wholly Government-owned, it is part of the Farm Credit System, and it is thoroughly experienced in farm mortgage lending, having been engaged in administering farm loans since its creation in 1934 and the creation of the Federal land banks in 1916. Moreover, the Corporation has the resources and facilities to carry out the program for purchasing GI farm loans, and no additional appropriations of funds would probably be necessary.

It is not likely that the purchase of GI loans would involve any substantial risk of loss to the Corporation. Under the GI bill, the Veterans' Administration guarantees up to 50 percent of the loan, the guaranteed amount not exceeding $4,000 for real-estate loans or $2,000 for non-real-estate loans, or a prorated portion of those amounts on a combination of both types of loans. When a loan is defaulted, the lender is entitled to receive the guaranteed percentage of the loan balance from the Veterans' Administration, and the lender may then recover the unguaranteed remainder of the loan from the security.

For example, if a real-estate loan for $6,000 were guaranteed for 50 percent, and after repayments of $1,000 the borrowing veteran defaulted leaving an unpaid balance of $5,000, the lender would recover $2,500—50 percent of the unpaid balance—from the Veterans' Administration and would then be entitled to recover the remaining $2,500 from the real-estate security which was appraised, when the loan was made, at $6,000 or more. The lender, therefore, ordinarily has little risk of loss. The Corporation, of course, would acquire the rights of the lender when it purchased a loan.

The bill (S. 245) to amend the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation Act to provide a secondary market for farm loans made under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina (for himself and Mr. AIKEN), was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CONDOLENCES ON DEATH OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF BYRD ANTARCTIC EXPEDITION

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, the three heroic naval officers who recently lost their lives in the Antarctic came respectively from the States of Rhode Island, Virginia, and Tennessee. Therefore, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. GREEN], the Senators from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR and Mr. STEWART], the Senators from Virginia [Mr. BYRD and Mr. ROBERTSON], and myself, I submit a resolution of condolence and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 58) was read as follows:

Whereas Ensign Maxwell Albert Lopez, of Newport, R. I.; Aviation Machinist's Mate First Class Frederick Warren Williams, of Huntingdon, Tenn.; and Aviation Radioman Second Class Wendell Keith Henderson, of Portsmouth, Va., lost their lives in the crash of a plane while on a photographic mission of the Byrd Antarctic Expedition; and

Whereas the deaths of these men were the first casualties of this historic expedition; and

Whereas they were engaged in scientific investigations and extraordinary aerial explorations the results of which may possibly prove of inestimable scientific value to the future of mankind and of great national importance to the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby tenders its condolences to the families of the deceased and expresses its gratitude for the heroic services of these men; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit a copy of these resolutions to the family of each of the deceased.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. WHITE. For the time being, at least, Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island will go over, under the rule.

COMMENT ON ADDRESS BY SENATOR MCCARRAN BEFORE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, among the very notable addresses delivered at the 1946 meeting of the American Bar Association, held in Atlantic City, N. J., was one by the distinguished senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] entitled "Improving Administrative Justice: Hearings and Evidence, Scope of Judicial Review." The importance of this address appears from the two opening sentences of an editorial in the American Bar Association Journal for December 1946, which read as follows:

If the 1946 annual meeting of the association had produced no other contribution to the cause of law-governed justice and the rights of persons and property under our Constitution, the address of Senator PAT MCCARRAN, of Nevada, on improving administrative agency justice would have made the occasion profoundly worth while for the lawyers and people of America. Of course, the sessions had many features of great interest and usefulness, but none could surpass Senator MCCARRAN's statement in its timeliness and significance.

In view of the great importance of this admirable address, which it was my pleasure and privilege to hear, I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial appearing in the American Bar Association Journal for December 1946 be printed in the RECORD as a portion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUDICIAL REVIEW OF AGENCY DISCRETION

If the 1946 annual meeting of the association had produced no other contribution to the cause of law-governed justice and the rights of persons and property under our Constitution, the address of Senator PAT MCCARRAN, of Nevada, on improving administrative agency justice would have made the occasion profoundly worth while for the lawyers and people of America. Of course, the sessions had many features of great interest and usefulness, but none could surpass Senator MCCARRAN's statement in its timeliness and significance.

The distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary expounded the place and part of the Administrative Procedure Act in restoring a government of laws and of defined and limited powers, in the place of administrative arbitrariness and agency discretion. He showed that the Congress must enact and set the standards and procedures for the agencies, require conformance to them, and vest the courts with both the powers and the duties to review and redress all legal wrongs done by the agencies through action or inaction. He pointed out the need that the cult of discretion be curbed, through plenary review.

The cosponsor of the McCarran-Sumners law went through it, section by section, to show that the above objectives had been plainly intended and attained by the Congress. We had read the statute as he says it was intended to be. Senator MCCARRAN'S authoritative statement, elsewhere in this issue, as to the legislative intent, is the most cheering and reassuring message that could be brought to lawyers and their harassed clients. Every lawyer will want and need to read his statement, line by line.

There will be agencies, and there may be courts, which will try to avoid and ignore or sabotage the plain intent and wording of the new law. The lawyers, the public, and the Congress, must be vigilant continually against any such encroachments or evasions. As former Attorney General Cummings said in Atlantic City, in presenting most appropriately to Carl McFarland the association's gold medal for conspicuous service to jurisprudence: "These gains (from the new act) must not be frittered away."

The association is honored that its assembly was the forum for Senator MCCARRAN'S epoch-marking statement, and the Journal feels highly privileged to bring to its readers a message which comes like a clearing wind after a night of fog and heralds the dawn of a new day.

GAGGING THE SERVICES—ARTICLE BY GEORGE FIELDING ELIOT

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to take a brief moment to read an excerpt from an article which appeared in yesterday's Washington Evening Star. The article was written by Maj. George Fielding Eliot, who is certainly a reliable reporter on military matters, and who tells us that—

The budget figures for the Army and Navy, as submitted by President Truman, do not represent the considered judgment of our military and naval leaders as to the needs of our national security. The budget figures are far below what those leaders consider necessary.

This, Mr. President, is the significant point. Major Eliot says:

But they can't talk about it. They can't even tell Congress about it when the time comes for budget hearings. They have been specifically and definitely gagged by Presidential order, reinforced by continual repetitions at every turn of the road.

It is, of course, the usual practice to bar any direct and open criticism of the budget figures. The service Secretaries, the Chiefs of Staff, and the Department and Bureau heads are supposed to appear before the Appropriations Committees to defend the budget, not to criticize it. But—

And this is a point I think will appeal to everyone who has ever served on the Appropriations Committee—

But it has always been the practice that members of the committees could ask for and receive professional opinions as to the adequacy of the budget figures on any particular point. Not this time. An officer so questioned by a Member of Congress can only say, unhappily, that he is not permitted to state his opinion—by order.

Mr. President, that is a very serious condition, and it is one which I think should interest every Member of this body, regardless of party, because the national defense is not a partisan question. If we are to be deprived of the only source of authoritative opinion on the maintenance of our national security, I think it is a very serious thing indeed, which should engage the attention of the Appropriations Committee and of the Committee on Armed Services.

I do not think we want to accept the judgment of the Budget Bureau on military matters and do it by accident. If we are going to accept their judgment on a matter, upon which in my opinion they are not competent to pass, we ought to do so deliberately.

I ask that this whole article be printed in full in the body of the RECORD, and I express the hope that every Member of the Senate will read it carefully.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GAGGING THE SERVICES

(By George Fielding Eliot)

The Budget figures for the Army and Navy, as submitted by President Truman, do not represent the considered judgment of our military and naval leaders as to the needs of our national security. The Budget figures are far below what those leaders consider necessary.

But they can't talk about it. They can't even tell Congress about it when the time comes for budget hearings. They have been specifically and definitely gagged by Presidential order, reinforced by continual repetitions at every turn of the road.

I have had a good deal of experience in reporting the progress of military and naval budgets, but I have never encountered a gag situation as strict as this one.

It is, of course, the usual practice to bar any direct and open criticism of the Budget figures. The service Secretaries, the Chiefs of Staff, and the Department and Bureau heads are supposed to appear before the Appropriations Committees to defend the budget, not to criticize it. But it has always been the practice that members of the committees could ask for and receive professional opinions as to the adequacy of the budget figures on any particular point. Not this time. An officer so questioned by a Member of Congress can only say, unhappily, that he is not permitted to state his opinion—by order.

It looks as though it is going to be a difficult matter for the Congress and the people to get the facts necessary to enable them to make up their minds whether, in this troubled and by no means secured world, they are taking adequate steps for their security during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948.

What they are getting now, let me repeat, is not the sober judgment of the Chiefs of Staff and the military and naval planners as to what the national security requires. What they are getting is the judgment of the Bureau of the Budget as to what part of the national expenditures should go to the Army and Navy. If this were confined to a simple statement by the Budget Bureau to the service departments of a limitation, in amount or in percentage, of the total sum available, the situation would not be quite so dangerous as it is. If, in effect, the Bureau said, "Look, boys, all you can have is so much; now you cut your coat to fit that pattern," there would be less ground for anxiety. Unfortunately, the Budget Bureau does not work that way. It goes into details which it is not competently staffed to decide. It tells the services that certain specific items must be cut out or reduced, instead of fixing an over-all limitation and allowing the seasoned judgment of the service chiefs to determine what items should have first priority.

It does not require any inside information to see how this works out. All one has to do is to analyze the published figures in the President's message against the known fact that heavy reductions have been made from the estimates originally submitted by the War and Navy Departments. The message estimates expenditures for military purposes (both Departments) at $11,100,000,000 for the fiscal year of 1948. This is divided into two principal classifications—(1) $5,200,000,000 for pay, subsistence, travel, welfare, training, clothing, and medical expenditures for military personnel; and (2) $5,900,000,000 for all other purposes, including procurement, research and development, construction, operation and maintenance, and citizen reserve activities.

Now the total numbers of regular personnel as presented in the final Army and Navy estimates have been published, and they have not been reduced in the Budget recommendations. Hence, there has been no substantial reduction in pay, subsistence, welfare, clothing, and medical care. In fact, the message notes considerable increases over 1947 in the cost of each man of these items. The only possible reduction in this category is in training.

The real reductions from the departmental estimates to the Budget figures must have come in the second category—which means, specifically, that research and development plus the procurement of new weapons and equipment and experiment therewith (as in the Arctic expeditions of last year) have taken a severe beating. This is precisely the category of military expenditures in which more, not less, money is required under existing circumstances—circumstances which make it possible for sober, well-informed officers to say that the whole armament of American forces may be drastically altered by 1951.

The whole situation now comes to the hands of the Congress. This is an economy-minded Congress, as reactions to the Budget message already have shown. But it is to be hoped that before Congress decides as to the military items of the Budget it will find means to obtain the considered judgment of the officers charged with responsibility for national security. It is further to be hoped that the people back home will insist, for the safety of their own hides, that Congress does exactly that.

THE RECLAMATION PROGRAM—ADDRESS BY COMMISSIONER OF RECLAMATION

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, as chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, I had the pleasure recently of appearing before a conference of the regional directors of the Bureau of Reclamation presided over by Commissioner Michael W. Straus. I was invited to give some of my views to the field representatives of the Bureau of Reclamation who were present, and I did not hesitate to tell them that the Congress expects action by the Bureau of Reclamation on the construction program for which appropriations have been made. The Bureau of Reclamation will be judged by the results it produces. It has an excellent record, but cannot afford to rest on past laurels.

As a construction engineer engaged in railroad building in the West in my earlier days, I know something about construction activities and I appreciate the problems before the Bureau of Reclamation in its irrigation developments. It was because of my experience and my interest in the development of the natural resources of the West, particularly land and water, that I sought membership on the Committee on Public Lands. I am highly pleased at the personnel of this committee on both the majority and minority sides. We will, I am sure, work together for the development of the West.

I wish to announce that at the organization meeting of the committee this morning we decided to hold our regular meetings weekly each Monday morning at 10:30.

Last October 10 in my home State of Nebraska, at the fifteenth annual convention of the National Reclamation Association, Commissioner Straus delivered a forward-looking address entitled "Reclamation: Where Do We Go From Here?" He outlined a program for the consideration of the people of the West and Congress, to which I desire to direct attention.

Mr. President, I request that the address may be printed following my remarks in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECLAMATION: WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

It is of happy significance to come again before the National Reclamation Association at its annual meeting, this time in Omaha, which is a funnel for the great Missouri Valley—a sixth of the Nation embracing the heart of America in which reclamation is now embarked on its most difficult, most needed, and possibly most fruitful program.

I was encouraged when a number of leaders of this group recently gave me an opportunity for prolonged conferences during which many perplexing problems with which we are now beset were discussed frankly. There was a meeting of minds on most courses of action that all of us in our assorted capacities must carry through to achieve our end-purpose of proceeding with and assisting in the development of irrigation in the West. As did my distinguished predecessors—the late Dr. Elwood Mead, John Page, and Harry Bashore, all of whom in turn gave me such of their wisdom as I could absorb—I wish to make here the Commissioner's annual report of the progress of reclamation. Also I wish to point out possible solutions of some of our immediate problems and, most important, to recommend ways of liberalizing the reclamation law.

The war's end, as you all know, left this country with an accumulated investment of almost a billion dollars in reclamation works—an investment built up over the 44 years of Federal reclamation. This now comprises over 4,000,000 acres of irrigated land and the biggest and best power generators in the world. The whole national standard of living would decline if it were not for the crops that Federal irrigation yields, which last year alone had a value of $420,000,000—in 1 year only, virtually equal to half the total Federal expenditure over nearly half a century. In my opinion, the United States never made a better investment. The end of hostilities also left us with new reclamation developments virtually at a standstill and our reclamation men, materials, and money on military furlough. Our future, but already authorized, program to extend reclamation to 10,000,000 additional acres and double power capacity was paralyzed.

The first postwar effort of the Bureau of Reclamation was to implement the plans which had been gathering dust during the years that the vital construction program was laid aside for the more vital destruction programs laid upon us by a war for national survival. Efforts to revive development were well received by the administration. In its first postwar reclamation appropriation, less than a year ago and again last July, Congress was generous to the extent of making the greatest single appropriation ever made in the history of the United States for reclamation. On July 1 all funds available to the Bureau of Reclamation for this fiscal year totaled $213,000,000, opening to the West the biggest irrigation construction program in its history.

But plans and appropriations themselves do nobody much good until the gap is bridged to actual resource development and putting the waters to work. It was to spanning that hazardous gap that the main effort of the Bureau was bent for the first 7 months of this year. We buckled down to driving our program into contracts and construction with results which are of interest.

In the last quarter of 1945, after demobilization started and we could take our attention away from doing things to the enemy and devote it to doing things for ourselves, the Bureau awarded $2,000,000 in construction contracts. The awards rose in the first quarter of this calendar year to $34,000,000 and in the second quarter of this year to $70,600,000. This meant $105,000,000 in new reclamation work driven under contract in the first 6 months of this year—a figure of which your new Commissioner was and is particularly proud. It also meant that the velocity that the reclamation program actually attained was at the rate of $210,000,000 a year—a record never approached heretofore in the history of this Nation. I also want to tell you that it is my personal conviction that the Bureau must be enabled to double that velocity in coming years. It will have to if we fulfill our trust. Congress has now authorized nearly $2,000,000,000 worth of reclamation work but funds therefor have not been as yet provided. On the authorization base, that means that there lies ahead and undone twice as much work as has been accomplished in 44 years.

Now our national reclamation program is not a program that can be properly operated on a stop-and-go schedule. It cannot be squeezed in and pulled out after the fashion of an accordion player operating on his instrument. It is an integrated program of planned heavy construction reaching to the very base of many communities and involving a myriad of operations in compliance with multiple myriads of State and National laws, regulations, and requirements. A national reclamation program, or even any single great reclamation program project, such as the Missouri Valley here or the Columbia Basin or the Central Valley of California, in the development period, is more like a great freight train which by constant nursing can, over a period of time, be accelerated to roll. But once the momentum is accumulated, it cannot be stopped short without wreckage, destruction, and waste. That is why all the effort was put into acceleration during the past months when, with authority approved by the Executive and the Congress and with generous appropriation of funds, it seemed that the road ahead was clearing. That is why we seek so desperately to achieve 10- and 20-year steady programs for the future. That is why it was particularly distressing to the reclamation world when, for national and international reasons, entirely beyond the control of water user's organizations or the Bureau of Reclamation, the President felt compelled to clamp ceilings upon our program far lower than those he, himself, the administration, and the Congress had approved but a few months prior. This is a matter of great interest to you, and I wish to be clear on exactly what has happened.

On August 2, because of a general and an alarming inflationary aspect in our national economy, two actions were publicly announced by the President. One action established an $85,000,000 construction ceiling on the Reclamation program for a 12-month period with a similar ceiling for the succeeding 12 months. Another action established a procedure under the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion for arresting and screening of future scheduled contract awards. The President at that time made it amply clear that this was not a revocation of reclamation funds or authority but a general change in schedule of various Federal construction work for the primary purpose of immediately combatting inflationary tendencies, eliminating competition, and aiding housing programs. This was in no sense an antireclamation move. It was an anti-inflationary temporary expedient, proclaimed as such, with clear enunciation of the fact that a permanent endeavor against inflation was being made by other means—principally, increased production. No projects were abandoned, no appropriations were revoked, no authority was removed, no program was discarded, no policies were scuttled. Were this hiatus to result in lower construction bids, it would mean lower-cost water and power for users in years to come. However, a violent change in schedule was imposed.

On the day the $85,000,000 annual ceilings were announced the Bureau had already assumed obligations virtually totaling that amount for the current year. Further contract awards were perforce suspended. We already were bumping that ceiling. It is this ceiling that now controls the program. We have not even got into the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion procedure for sifting projects. There is little purpose in so doing until the ceilings are altered.

The President's orders have not required any abandonment of our program. The program has merely been spread over a longer period. Our planning and preconstruction work is continuing. None of the contracts let has yet been canceled. They all remain in force. Those jobs are continuing or going into construction in all of your States. But few more contracts can be awarded under the present orders. In many cases those contracts which are already awarded and in construction only advance but cannot complete projects into finished useful operating and earning units, putting water on dry land and generating needed kilowatts. That is why lifting of the freeze is anxiously awaited. That is why it would be more economical, from many points of view, if national conditions permitted us to complete our job on an orderly, brisk, and businesslike schedule.

We have the velocity of the program up so high that we can run on accumulated, but declining, momentum of construction contracts already awarded for a short time. But that does not bring forward the new projects that various sponsors have served so well and looked forward to so hopefully. There is no denying the fact that if the economic situation compelled the administration to impose a protracted freeze instead of a temporary suspension it would be a serious blow to western reclamation and a great disappointment to the plans of reclamationists.

That is why the Secretary of the Interior and the Bureau of Reclamation immediately appealed the limitations on reclamation and made our case strong. The President has referred the reconsideration to the Bureau of the Budget. We have pleaded the case with fervor. Today we await the decision.

Involved in this decision are many questions of national economics, fiscal policy, and procedure, all of which are being discussed. This is no place for me to repeat the case, but I want to correct, through you, some popular misconceptions of the discussion that I have seen in print.

Of course, Reclamation does not compete with industry for the general field of irrigation endeavor, for business is not generally interested in building irrigation systems today. Also, there is little competition between reclamation construction and the other more common forms of construction requiring those building materials that are in short supply.

Reclamation is primarily an earth-moving and concreting operation. Naturally, there is no shortage of earth to be moved and, believe it or not, there remain some cement mills in this country not operating at full capacity. The area of overlap with other building in competition for short-supply materials is a narrow, changing area of less than 3 percent of the materials reclamation needs, in which the principal item is lumber, largely used in forms. By the priority system, housing construction has first call on lumber under any circumstances. Reclamation takes second place. Reclamation cannot compete there.

Another fact I wish to bear down on is that reclamation housing should not be considered competition with veterans' housing. That is because reclamation housing itself is a true form of veterans' housing, and nobody can compete with himself. Dwellers in any reclamation housing—be it temporary, prefabricated, or permanent; be it in construction camps, for maintenance people on operating projects, or for settlers on new farms—are nearly 100 percent veterans. Ex-servicemen, by Bureau desire and policy, as well as by law, get preference on the reclamation jobs in construction, maintenance, and settlement. So, reclamation is not only veterans' housing, entitled to the privileges this country grants those worthy servicemen; it is also veterans' jobs through the employment it gives veterans during the construction period, plus veterans' settlement when water comes to the land giving, with priority, ex-servicemen an opportunity to establish themselves in a firm and staple civilian economy.

You, gentlemen, have established the fact that reclamation is no part of any general grab-bag of Federal public works. In the first place, no reclamation projects have been presented to the Congress for approval since long before the war on the ground that they are needed for employment purposes. All the pending reclamation projects that Congress has approved won their clearance on the straight ground that they represented needed natural-resources development.

Reclamation development, in addition, is the one type of Federal public works which must pay for itself in hard cash. It is time we see to it that reclamation is segregated from other categories of works and is accorded its proper preferred position as a unique Federal regenerative activity. It is dynamic in its effects on industry and business throughout the Nation and a prerequisite if the United States is going to clothe, feed, and maintain its steadily increasing population up to American standards. It is time we see to it that the whole Nation knows that reclamation is no newfangled type of get-rich-quick western promotion. One-fourth of the world's population now is fed and clothed by the irrigated land on which it lives. This has been developing for 6,000 years. How long does it take some people to learn?

United States money put into reclamation is not money just spent. It is a conservative form of investment. I am a pretty conservative citizen. I am just selfish enough to want my money well and wisely invested and I don't know any form of Federal spending that approaches in secure fundamental values the irrigation water and power works of the West.

There are many other matters on which I could elaborate, but I will only tick off a few of them at this time.

First, the Bureau of Reclamation's traditional policy of recognizing States' and local laws and rights still holds. Despite a welter of oratory for convenient purposes on diverse occasions, the proof that that policy prevails is its practice day in and day out. I propose no change.

Second, the irrigator's greatest service to reclamation is to figure how he can live up to his contractual obligations and not to figure how to get out of them. Most irrigators do honor their contracts, and that is well. The Congress has told me plainly that when they don't, Federal aid to irrigation stops.

Third, construction costs have soared, and new water is going to cost you more in dollars. That means repayment estimates are also up over initial estimates figured before the war on many projects engineered then and being built now. Likewise, the benefits reaped are more in dollars. I honor such irrigation groups as those on the Frenchman-Cambridge project, right here in Nebraska, or the Provo River project, in Utah, who met this situation fairly and squarely by advising the Secretary of the Interior that their repayable obligation can be increased 50 percent.

Fourth, in these days of almost instantaneous repercussions of a complex economy, it is an absolute prerequisite of successful natural-resource development that the several Federal agencies dovetail and integrate their plans in their various fields and with local and State agencies. To that end, the Bureau of Reclamation will work closely with the able Army Engineer Corps and others through the interagency committees and other coordinating groups.

Fifth, and finally, irrigation of arid lands always has been, is, and will remain the primary purpose of the Bureau of Reclamation. Other multiple purposes, including power generation, are secondary but, nevertheless, vital and essential. Power has become the paying partner in most present and future reclamation works that makes them financially feasible. Don't be fooled on this. It has to be low-cost power or the irrigationist loses—loses not only as a big power purchaser and consumer but also as a water user. Run up your reclamation power rates and we no longer command and create the wide power markets that produce the revenues required to aid irrigation. Lose those broad low-cost power markets and most of your present reclamation construction and even more of your future jobs go out the window under existing law as financially infeasible. This is the third time I have so reported at these annual meetings. I will keep on repeating it as long as necessary and as long as it is true.

These observations bring me to the chief subject of my report, which is to invite your attention to the present status of the Federal reclamation laws. They have been, in my opinion, splendid laws which have, for the past 44 years, served us well. They undoubtedly will receive some overhauling in the coming session of Congress. You and the Bureau of Reclamation want that overhauling to be one that forwards the cause of reclamation in the West.

In 1902, when the basic reclamation law was written by leaders of the West under Theodore Roosevelt, it was a liberal law conceived chiefly for single-purpose local irrigation projects. It remains the basic law today. But the world does move. What was so forward-looking that it was almost revolutionary in 1902 has, in some aspects, become so static that it is perhaps reactionary in 1946. And a law which served well to aid the easy and simple local single-purpose project, now all built, is not a modern instrument of legislation for today's and tomorrow's complex multiple-purpose projects which must be conceived and executed on a valley- or basin-wide scale to meet, as they must meet, the demands of your States. Reclamation's famed engineers can only function within the area permitted them by the laws that set their tasks.

Thomas Jefferson, who looked forward and not backward, died too soon to be with us today. But he gave us a philosophy that laws must change with the times that meets our situation verbatim this afternoon.

"I am certainly not an advocate for frequent and untried changes in laws," wrote Jefferson. "But I know that laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also and keep pace with the times."

Reclamation here today is an institution that also does not advocate abandoning any of the time-tested and sound fundamentals of reclamation law, including the tenet that those benefited should contribute to the expense in accordance with their rewards and their ability to pay. But we have a strong case to present to the Congress next year for a change with the times.

Today, as our country fills up, there is increasing and undeniable interest in the development of our recreation and fish and wildlife resources. This growing demand should not be contested but should be well served at future multiple-purpose reclamation reservoirs. They offer this opportunity without detriment to irrigation. So, during the last days of the Seventy-ninth Congress we obtained a new law (Public Law 732) worthy of your attention, which authorized allocations on a basis that the irrigator need not repay that part of the cost of our reclamation projects that can properly be allocated to benefits to fish and wildlife.

We have already had this success on the legislative program that I outlined to you last year in Denver. Why now should the reclamation laws not be amended in the same way with respect to purely recreational features of a reservoir so that these benefits are achieved without saddling the expense of the vacationist or the nature lover at reclamation reservoirs on the local water users—as required by the present law? The answer, of course, is that such action is due. The Bureau of the Budget and the President have already approved a proposal by Reclamation to have recreation benefits allocated as nonreimbursable national benefits, thus lifting this fiscal burden from the backs of the irrigationists. With proper attention of the Western States, this proposal, already approved as to language, will pass Congress and become law. But the modernization of the reclamation laws should not stop there.

Why, for an example of inconsistency, should the United States charge western power users 3 percent interest for investments in developing the power of rivers right in our country here while the same United States lends billions of dollars at less than 2 percent interest to countries all over the world for the same and other purposes thousands of miles from our homes? I am satisfied that our reclamation power interest rate should be lowered to at least 2 percent. We are discriminating against ourselves and must continue to do so under the present laws until you change them.

Why should we insist, as the law now does, that water users return all allotted costs of construction in 40 to 50 years for dams, reservoirs and canals with a proven useful life of 100 or 200 or, for all we know, thousands of years? Railroads, power companies, and other public service corporations are set up on a perfectly proper and legal basis that provides financing contemplating repayment only within the useful life of the works built. Of course, they generally never repay their construction investment but merely keep their plant in shape and then refinance and refinance all within the useful life of the works. That is considered sound practice. Why does the great United States, when it undertakes to aid its own citizens develop their own national resources, impose such harsh terms? Reclamation must—until the law is changed. You can speed that change.

Why do we take an astigmatic view of Federal irrigation? Why, when we study its place in our economic picture, do we look through the wrong end of the spyglass? Legislativewise we keep our books on the basis that any balances due on a project—on Boulder Dam or Coulee Dam—are debts. But in balancing the books we seem to be blind to the fact that these and similar capital investments on the other side of the ledger become credits ranking, without challenge, among our most productive national assets.

When irrigation creates from the desert or sagebrush a Phoenix, a Boise, a Scottsbluff, or, specifically, a Yakima—on which an investment of $37,000,000 over a period of years brought back in the single year of 1945 crops worth $78,000,000—are we or are we not broadening the tax base? Is the wealth created at a Yakima taxable or not—and is it taxed?

Why isn't that hard-cash form of Federal tax revenue, resulting directly from Federal irrigation and as nonexistent as water in the desert without irrigation, entered on Uncle Sam's books when Reclamation's account is cast up? Do, or do not, these reclamation communities open new markets to pour revenue into the National Tax Treasury of the United States of America, not to mention the taxed treasuries of the United States Steel Co., the United States Rubber Co., the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the American Tobacco Co., the National Biscuit Co., the National Cash Register Co. (and let's not overlook those distinguished supplemental irrigators, the National Distillers Co.), and all the rest of the star-spangled corporate galaxy that collectively form our economy. Can we afford not to build these reclamation projects and broaden our tax base? Can we halt inflation and balance the Budget without creating this real new wealth? Why don't we recognize these facts in our laws?

For a number of years now, the United States has considered expenditures to control floods—expenditures in the national interest to be paid from the National Treasury and not by the local beneficiaries. Of course, this has naturally lured many localities to disguise irrigation development as flood-control proposals with frequently sad results. But what no one can explain is why in the name of logic, consistency, or wisdom, it is a local reimbursable benefit for which the farmers should pay to aid agriculture by putting water on acres, and at the same time it is not a local but a national and nonreimbursable benefit for which the farmer should not pay to aid agriculture by holding water off acres—frequently the same acres at different seasons.

And, by the same token, will someone please tell us why flood control is, under our laws, a national and nonreimbursable purpose, and silt control, which is vital in the Southwest, is not so considered? They are both tremendously damaging, except that one happens to be a flood of land and the other a flood of water.

Please understand me clearly. I make no criticism of the flood-control laws. But I for one would like to see the same standards applied to wealth-creating irrigation which happens to be what is needed in the dry but fertile West. Perhaps you will put these remarks down to the fact that your reclamation commissioner suffers from a vocational disease that makes him want to see water work so he prefers the positive benefits of full irrigation reservoirs to the negative benefits of empty flood-control reservoirs. But at any rate let us join together and secure rational and reconcilable policies and laws. And, as we undertake that task, please consider where your interest and your people's interest lies.

The last Congress started a reexamination of the reclamation laws. The undertaking will be resumed by the next Congress. Now is the time to liberalize the reclamation laws. Our ability to discharge the tasks we have undertaken in great measure rests on further development of the ever-evolving reclamation laws that are both our legal foundation and our actual ceiling. Give this matter your full attention and wisdom in the coming months so that we may be enabled to go forward undeterred to our mutual goal of putting all the available water in the arid West to useful work.

CONTINUATION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE NATIONAL DEFENSE PROGRAM

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 46, a resolution continuing the authority for the investigation of the national defense program.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 46, Calendar 2, which will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 46) continuing the authority for the investigation of the national defense program.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Maine, which is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 46), which is as follows:

Resolved, That the authority conferred by Senate Resolution 71, Seventy-seventh Congress, agreed to March 1, 1941; Senate Resolution 146, Seventy-seventh Congress, agreed to August 11, 1941; Senate Resolution 288, Seventy-seventh Congress, agreed to September 17, 1942; Senate Resolution 6, Seventy-eighth Congress, agreed to January 25, 1943; Senate Resolution 146, Seventy-eighth Congress, agreed to May 20, 1943; Senate Resolution 235, Seventy-eighth Congress, agreed to February 8, 1944; and Senate Resolution 319, Seventy-eighth Congress, agreed to August 23, 1944, and Senate Resolution 55, Seventy-ninth Congress, agreed to January 29, 1945 (relating to the investigation of the national defense program), is hereby continued during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. I thank the Senator from Utah. To Senate Resolution 46 I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "until December 31, 1947."

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I merely want to explain the amendment. It limits the life of the committee, so that it will not be continued or extended through the entire Eightieth Congress, but only until December 31, 1947. This committee undoubtedly has not had time to finish its work. Within the present session of Congress we can reappraise the situation and determine whether the committee should be continued beyond December 31, 1947. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. BROOKS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah has the floor. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I inquire of the Senator from Illinois if that is the only amendment proposed to be offered to the resolution which is now before the Senate?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I am just informed that there is another amendment to be offered. But I have offered my amendment and ask for its adoption.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I inquire if the amendment is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is debatable.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. In accordance with discussions had with some members of the Committee on Armed Services I have prepared an amendment which I should like to offer at this time so it will be on the table, if that will be agreeable to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is agreeable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, there is an amendment pending. There cannot be two amendments pending at the same time.

Mr. BREWSTER. I will offer the amendment as a substitute for the pending amendment, as it covers both the matter of time and also the matter of limitation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Maine offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending amendment.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is correct.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my amendn ent to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois withdraws his amendment.

The Senator from Maine submits an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, it is proposed to strike out lines 12 and 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "defense program): is hereby continued during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eightieth Congress (except as hereinafter provided): Provided, That on and after the date this resolution is agreed to, the authority contained in such Senate Resolution 71 shall be limited, with respect to the subject matter authorized to be studied and investigated therein, to excessive profits, fraud, corruption, waste, extravagance, mismanagement, incompetence, and inefficiency in expenditures, connected with the prosecution of the national defense program for World War II: Provided further, That the committee shall report to the Senate the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations, as soon as practicable, but in no event later than January 31, 1948, at which time all powers and duties conferred upon the committee shall terminate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER].

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I do not at this time wish to address the Senate in regard to the merits of the amendment just offered by the Senator from Maine or in regard to the merits of the resolution which the amendment would change. I wish to discuss the main point, which is the fundamental consideration in this whole discussion, as to the meaning and intent of Congress when it enacted the reorganization law.

As a member of the Committee on the Organization of Congress and as one who I think understood the purpose of placing a limitation upon select committees, and the reason for it, I was surprised to see the request made for the continuation of certain select committees. I thought, of course, that such a resolution would be referred to one of the standing committees; and if it were reported favorably it would at least have the recommendation of such standing committee before it came to us for consideration.

From a parliamentary standpoint, I feel—although I am not pressing the point—that the submission of Senate Resolution 46 itself might have been questionable, and that probably a point of order could be made. I say that because I feel so keenly on the subject.

One of the reasons why Congress loses control of itself is that it divides itself up into so many activities. I am sure that if Senators will study the past they will conclude that investigations which have been carried on by subcommittees of standing committees have been quite as effective as those conducted by special investigating committees. Such investigations have had the added merit of having passed in review before a standing committee every time a request has been made for renewal of authority or for additional funds. In that way the Senate retains control of the activities of its committees. In no other way can it maintain control, because an investigating committee is a never-ending affair.

There was a time when I argued for continuation of an investigating committee on the score that the committee in being was of great worth to the country. The mere fact that it existed was of great value. The committee was then considering matters which were of vital importance to the whole country, and the committee was used for the purpose of allowing the whole country to have a clearing house of discussion. But even at that time the process of review existed, because the particular committee was a subcommittee, and whenever the subcommittee asked for additional funds or for a continuation of authority, there was a double review by standing committees of the Senate. The request had to be approved by the standing committee of which the subcommittee was a part, and before money could be obtained the request had to be approved not only by the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but also by the Senate itself.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Let me finish this point. That method seems to those of us who were working on the reorganization to be sufficiently broad and careful and at the same time to permit all that might be desired to be done, leaving complete control with the Senate. That was the fundamental reason for the change.

I now yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I am not clear whether the Senator is now a member of the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator from Utah is not a member of the Committee on Armed Services at the present time.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think perhaps the Senator is not aware that this question has been the subject of rather thorough discussion and exploration in the Committee on Armed Services, which is the primary committee having jurisdiction. I am sorry that the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] is not present in the Chamber at this time. However, it is my understanding that at least a majority of the committee is prepared to approve the resolution with the amendment which I have offered. I can not speak for the minority. I assume that we shall hear from them in due time. So the question has been informally cleared along the lines which I think the Senator so properly suggests.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I was not informed that the resolution had been referred by formal action to the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. BREWSTER. I did not mean so to indicate. It was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, I believe, before the Senate was fully conscious of all the problems which were presented. Following that, I was asked to appear before the Committee on Armed Services, and I have had rather full discussions of the question with members of that committee. So I think I am warranted in saying that the chairman of the committee, the Senator from South Dakota, speaking for a considerable number of members of the committee, feels that the resolution, as proposed, states the views of those members of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I think the Senator will agree that my point is still valid, that if upon the submission of the resolution itself it had been referred to the Committee on Armed Services and had been favorably reported by that committee, the committee sought to be authorized would have the standing of a subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services. At least that would be implied. That is the argument which I make.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I am very much interested in what the distinguished Senator from Utah is saying. He is entirely correct as to the procedure which should be followed. But let me disabuse his mind. It never was intended that the resolutions now being considered should be referred to the respective standing committees. On the contrary, those committees were purposely bypassed; the fact that the subject-matters were appropriate for consideration by the respective standing committees was disregarded, and the resolutions were reported and placed in our hands without hearings. They are the first two resolutions to come before the Senate in the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is as I understand the situation. I should like to say in connection with this discussion with the Senator from Maine and the Senator from New Hampshire that the committee which became the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program had its origin in the Committee on Military Affairs. The question was considered by a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, and when the resolution was first reported it was with the understanding that the investigating committee would be a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs. Afterward, as a result of formal action by the Senate, it became a special committee. That was after the resolution had been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and after it had been considered by the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. President, inasmuch as I wish to confine my remarks to a limited field, in an attempt to show what our committee had in mind, I shall try to confine myself to my notes.

I listened with absorbing interest to the debate last Friday and the following Monday on Senate Resolutions 20 and 46, one providing for the appointment of a special committee to study the problems of small business and the other proposing to continue the authority for the investigation of the national defense program. These resolutions raise questions of fundamental importance involving efficient legislative procedure and the role of special investigating committees in the legislative process.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understand that the Senator is now discussing the Small Business Committee. Has the Senator finished his discussion of the war contract problem?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. As I stated, I do not intend to discuss the merits of either of the resolutions. I merely wish to discuss the question of select committees and the procedure which should be followed, as well as what was attempted to be accomplished by the Reorganization Act.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understood the Senator to refer specifically and in some detail to the original resolutions, and I thought it might be proper to ask a question.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I did not mention the original resolution with respect to the Small Business Committee.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator was speaking of the original resolution in connection with the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program, was he not?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is true.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall withhold the interruption until later.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I should like to discuss these questions on the high ground of the basic principles of good legislative organization and administration, without reference to personal ambitions or partisan advantage.

In discussing these important questions I can claim to speak with some knowledge and objectivity. Before coming to the Senate I had been for many years a teacher of government at my State university. Later I served as vice president of the American Political Science Association—the professional association of the teachers and practitioners of political science in the United States I was associated with the committee on Congress of that association which made a long, impartial survey of the machinery and methods of our national legislature. I had the honor of being a member of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress which made a prolonged, careful, and intensive study of legislative organization and operation, and which produced the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

Mr. President, I must have deemed this question quite important, because this is the first time in my life I ever made an introduction of my own activities in quite that way. Probably I was not conscious of it when it was done, but I am conscious now that I have done something which I have never done before.

Speaking both as a close student of representative government and as an experienced practitioner of the political art, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, and especially newcomers to the Senate, to consider the issue before us with open minds and with a view to the long-run welfare and repute of the United States Senate.

BACKGROUND OF REORGANIZATION ACT

The older Members of this body well know the circumstances that led to the passage of the Legislative Reorganization Act last July, but the recently elected Senators may not be equally familiar with them. The executive branch of our National Government had been somewhat reorganized in the late 1930's to carry the burden of increased domestic activity. But since 1921 Congress had made no reorganization or improvement of its facilities and procedures even to meet the rising burden of its peacetime business. Recurring national crises, induced by two world wars and a great depression, had called forth strong popular leader Presidents, accelerating the trend toward Presidential government and threatening to convert Congress into a mere ceremonial appendix to bureaucracy. While the onward sweep of science and technology and the mammoth wartime mobilization of our human and industrial resources were raising the Nation to new pinnacles of power in world affairs, Congress still was working with the tools and techniques inherited from the wig and snuff-box era. And when, after the Second World War, the administration sought to streamline its sprawling agencies, many legislators seemed content to carry on with our antiquated stagecoach equipment.

Mr. President, that is not meant as an attack on Congress. It is not even meant as an attack on what we have done, because, thank goodness, Congress has held its power in our country and the Congress has never lost its head. But with the development of our country administrative and executive activities were so greatly multiplied that Congress was not able to keep up with the growth of our executive and administrative agencies. Those are facts which everyone realized. That condition came about quite naturally. It did not come about by design, it came about as a result of circumstances, and probably will come about again if we have to pass through the same sort of conditions.

Mr. President, I cannot repeat too often the statement that under the Constitution of the United States Congress is the policy-forming branch of the Government; and having that power and that right, if Congress at any time finds itself working at disadvantage with the administrative or executive branches, then the very intent of the fathers of our Constitution becomes frustrated.

Mr. President, those are facts of history. We know that the Congress is not the body to execute, it is not the body to administer; but it is the body to direct. By resort to the expedient of special committees, Congress to a great extent actually loses control because of the independent way in which investigating committees set about and carry on their work without review by a standing committee of the Senate.

That is the history of many investigations. They started out to look into particular facts in a very narrow field. One thing after another comes up, and before we realize it they are not only covering the whole country geographically but, as a result of the war activities, the committee having to do with the investigation of the national defense program found itself compelled practically to extend its investigation all over the world.

As an illustration of how special committees evolve, I cite the way this particular committee has grown and developed, and how the original intent was lost sight of almost completely as a result of such growth and development. I cannot speak with certainty, because I have not studied all aspects of the question, but I know that originally the committee was thought of at least as combining Army and Navy activities, and therefore it was made up of members who were interested in those branches of our Government. As time went on, however, others were added to the committee until, as I remember, reports were made to the Senate from that committee by Senators who were not members of either of the armed-service committees. In no time Senators taking new assignments on that committee found themselves in fields which were never anticipated. That is the reason why the Senate should retain control, as I have suggested.

Alarmed by the growing imbalance between the legislative and executive branches of the National Government, and warned as well by the fate of parliaments in the totalitarian countries of Europe, the protagonists of efficient representative government in Congress itself began to consider ways and means for strengthening the legislative branch. Firm in the faith that legislative assemblies are the first defense of democracy, they launched a series of independent surveys into the causes of congressional decline and possible remedies.

Mr. President, we had seen what had taken place in other nations of the world. We saw what was taking place in this country. A deliberative body made up of representatives of the people has always been, since that technique of government was thought of, the first objective of public concern, and therefore in all governments it becomes the first objective of ridicule, if ridicule is in order, and it becomes the first objective of those who would wish to change the form of government or weaken the idea of popular sovereignty. These things actually threaten here, as they have threatened in other countries, where changes have actually occurred. I remember well the first visit I made to the old Austro-Hungarian Parliament and the impressions I received and the confusion which existed there. That was an international parliament, without the control which now prevails in international meetings, for there were no formal translations, no formal order; but on the floor of that parliament there was the opportunity to use several official languages. To all who from the gallery viewed the proceedings of that parliament, there seemed to be utter confusion.

Then, too, Mr. President, I remember Hitler's description of that parliament because he, as a young man, saw the same parliament at about the same time, I imagine, that I did. As a result of the apparent disorder which he saw in that parliamentary body, Hitler condemned the whole parliamentary system, thereby condemning democracy and condemning representative government.

In this country many of our citizens receive impressions of confusion with respect to our own legislative bodies. Many of our people do not understand the committee system of parliamentary bodies. They do not understand that in every branch of government, including the Senate and the House of Representatives there are certain officials who keep track of things. Many of our people do not understand that the proceedings in our parliamentary bodies are actually very orderly and efficient, even though sometimes, as viewed from the galleries, they do not seem to be overly orderly, and they are criticized. Such criticism leads to other criticisms, until the whole legislative process or the representative system is pointed out as not doing its part. Legislators must live in gold-fish bowls. The sessions must be in public, if popular sovereignty is to prevail. These are the risks which any democracy runs, and these are the risks to which our Congress is exposed at all times.

All of us know the results. Where was the interest? Who was talked about? Was notice given in the public press which is supposed to be the guardian of popular sovereignty? Under the old scheme of things the public press was spoken of as the fourth estate, which I think it is, and which I hope it will always be—the information bureau for the people, to inform the people regarding what the people's agents are doing. It is unfortunate when administrative and executive agencies of a democratic government become so active and so attractive—the prima donnas of government, so to speak, and I use the word advisedly—that interested persons look only to them and not to legislative bodies. If we review what has taken place in the past 10 or 11 years in our country, we find that the praise, the eulogies, the pomp, if we wish to call it that, and the splendor, which should never be mentioned in a democracy, have chiefly been given to or associated with the administrative branch of government. Under such circumstances democracy can always be in danger and throughout the history of the world democracies have been assumed to be the least stable of all governments. On the contrary, democratic institutions have been very stable.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I do not know that I have been able to understand fully the implications of all the Senator's remarks, but I am sure he did not intend in any way to imply that the gentleman who for 4 years served as chairman of the particular committee under discussion and is now President of the United States, was a prima donna.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine has completely misunderstood what I said. I was speaking only of the administrative branch of the Government; and under the logic of my remarks, the only time the former chairman of that committee has had a chance to be a prima donna has been since he has moved into the White House.

Mr. President, as I said a few moments ago, firm in the faith that legislative assemblies are the first defense of democracy, the protagonists of efficient representative government launched a series of independent surveys into the causes of congressional decline and possible remedies. These surveys, including that conducted by our own joint committee, reached substantially the same conclusions as to the defects of our legislative structure and operation and as to the appropriate correctives. It was generally agreed that Congress was neither organized nor equipped to perform adequately its main, modern functions of determining policy, supervising the administration, controlling Federal expenditures, and representing the people.

Devised to handle the simpler tasks of an earlier day, our legislative procedures and machinery were by common consent no longer competent to cope satisfactorily with the grave and complex problems of the postwar world. They would have to be modernized if we were to avoid an imminent breakdown of the legislative branch of the National Government.

Mr. President, one of the greatest compliments paid to American democracy in a long time has been the respect of our leaders, and especially the Republican leaders, since now they are in control in the Congress, for the reorganization scheme and law as passed by Congress. All during the past summer there were predictions that Congress would pay no attention to this law, that especially the committee in which I was so interested, the committee studying the proposed unification of the armed services, would be ignored, and that the recommendations of that committee would not be carried out. However, we find that the leaders in both Houses of Congress have stood by the law, have respected it, and are respecting it.

Recognizing alike its own serious deficiencies and the rising popular demand for positive reforms, Congress created, 2 years ago, a joint committee to study its internal organization and operation. The committee took its assignment most seriously, in fact, Mr. President, at one time I felt that the committee, of which I was a member, was taking its assignment too seriously, especially when it invited every Member of the Congress of the United States to come before it and testify. In other words, we extended the invitation to testify to everyone who had a vital interest in the reorganization of Congress. When we did that, I thought we not only had on our hands a 2-year job, but a 5-year or perhaps a 10-year job. However, it did not turn out that way. It turned out that practically every suggestion was worth while, was seriously offered, was worthy of attention, and it received attention by the committee. Probably seldom are there open hearings in which the interest is so keen and in which the motives of all the witnesses are so clear and so splendid. That, Mr. President, is a compliment to the Congress of the United States.

Our committee took its assignment most seriously, as I have said. It made a full and complete study of every aspect of the legislative process. The committee held 39 hearings and many executive sessions. We heard the testimony of more than 100 witnesses, including distinguished political scientists, public-spirited citizens, and spokesmen for civic and professional organizations. Forty-five Members of Congress testified in person and many others submitted written statements and suggestions. One of those who appeared was Robert Heller, well-known efficiency engineer of Cleveland, Ohio, chairman of the National Committee for Strengthening Congress and author of an objective study of the whole subject.

Our committee shared the widespread congressional and public belief that a grave constitutional crisis existed in which the fate of representative government itself was at stake.

Mr. President, I think that is not an overstatement, as will appear if we go into the details of the acts which we ourselves have passed in attempting to correct what had become an evil. The present acting majority leader, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], was author of a resolution wherein the practice of borrowing experts from the administrative branch of our Government was condemned, and it went so far as to require that a report be made to the Secretary showing the experts so borrowed. We found at one time in the Senate—and I think it was the Senator from Nebraska who pointed it out; it would have been consistent for him to do that—that the Presiding Officer had to order the floor of the Senate cleared of persons who were not entitled to be on the floor, who were not connected with the legislative branch, who had been borrowed from administrative activities, and were working here with Senate committees. I think it is not an overstatement for me to say that matters had gotten into such shape that reorganization was necessary, and that it should have been carried out.

The Joint Committee on Organization carefully studied the testimony we had received and deliberated upon our recommendations for many months. Finally, last March, we submitted to Congress a 35-page report—unanimous save for minor reservations—to which we all contributed our best thought and judgment. This report was not the work of any one or two members of the joint committee. Rather, it was a cooperative undertaking and joint product of the 12 Senators and Representatives who composed the joint committee.

Mr. President, as this statement deals with history, I think it should be pointed out that Senator La Follette was not our first chairman. Our first chairman was Senator Maloney, of Connecticut, who died soon after becoming chairman.

Something rather significant, and what was in harmony with what our committee is trying to do, happened. It is not often that the representative of the minority in the Senate and in the House is made chairman of a joint committee. Senator La Follette, however, was almost unanimously chosen—his choice was unanimous when it came to formal action. Other names had been suggested for the chairmanship, following the old rule of observing seniority. But Senator La Follette was made chairman of the joint committee, and he submitted the report of the committee as a Senator of the United States, not in any sense as a representative of the minority side of the Senate or any partisan group.

In our meetings there was never any mention of partisan advantage one way or the other, and anyone who will study the committee report and study the law which was passed will discover that nonpartisanship, so far as expert advice and the whole field covered by the original report was concerned, was observed, and everything was done on the basis of merit, and not on the basis of politics. In setting up the machinery for a permanent structure there must be fairness on each side, and not a seizing of advantage, or we may undo much of what has been done.

ADOPTION OF THE REFORM PROGRAM

On May 13, 1946, Senator La Follette, chairman of the joint committee, introduced the legislative reorganization bill in the Senate, which passed the measure, after 5 days' debate, on June 10, by a vote of 49 to 16. The only noteworthy provision of the bill which the Senate failed to approve was that for the creation of a personnel director, who would have had the task of coordinating the scattered internal housekeeping services of the Congress, and of recommending a modern system of personnel administration for its employees. This provision was denounced as setting up a "superlord over the Senate," by half a dozen Senators who, had they foreseen the approaching change in party control of this body, might have supported this barrier to the patronage system as a protection against the recent dismissal of their qualified appointees.

During the Senate debate on the bill, a few Senators, including Senator MEAD and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] questioned the desirability of section 126 which imposed a ban on the future establishment of special or select committees. But their doubts on this score appeared to be set at rest by Senator La Follette's assurance, first, that the jurisdiction of the reorganized standing committees had been so comprehensively described in the bill as to cover every conceivable subject of legislative concern; and, second, by his reminder that the Senate can always expand the jurisdiction of a standing committee to embrace some unanticipated problem, or suspend its rules by a two-thirds vote and establish a special committee to deal with a novel subject.

With this assurance, opposition to this provision evaporated and the Senate approved of the entire measure by a 3-to-1 vote. As the reorganization bill passed the Senate only 7 months ago, it contained this language:

SEC. 126. No bill or resolution, and no amendment to any bill or resolution, to establish or to continue a special or select committee, including a joint committee, shall be received or considered in either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

HOUSE ACTION ON THE BILL

After the reform bill passed the Senate last June almost intact, except for the decapitation of the personnel "director-generalissimo," as one Senator described him, it was messaged to the House of Representatives where for 6 weeks it rested quietly on the Speaker's table, while the House managers of the measure negotiated with the House leadership over the conditions of its admission to the floor of the House. The upshot of these protracted negotiations was the deletion from the bill the Senate had approved of a group of provisions designed to bring about a better meshing of our governmental gears. Closer liaison between the Senate and the House of Representatives by means of joint hearings of their parallel committees on matters of mutual interest; coordination between the standing committees of each House, and over-all planning of the legislative program by means of policy committees; and better teamwork between Congress and the President via a joint legislative-executive council, were among the major items in the price that had to be paid before our bill received a green light to the House floor. Those who are familiar with the need for these improvements in our governmental machinery will appreciate how heavy a price it was. As one of the authors of these important provisions, I sincerely hope that the new leadership of Congress, who are responsible for keeping the means and ends of American government in balance, will take steps at an early date to strengthen Congress by restoring these stricken provisions.

The point there is that the Senate did pass upon that provision.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRICKER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The distinguished Senator just stated that when section 126 was up for consideration in the Senate Chamber the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the then Senator from New York, Mr. Mead, debated quite strongly the issue as to whether we should continue special committees. In connection with the history which is now being given, I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that back in the early stages of the consideration of the joint committee the House Members raised the point that because their standing committees did not have the subpena power they desired that there be contained in the act provision for the right of the House to create special committees. It seems to me that somewhere I got that impression, either from the report or from talking with Senators relative to special committees.

I am asking the Senator if he recalls whether it is not true that, either under the leadership of the late Senator Maloney, of Connecticut, or under the leadership of Senator La Follette, the House never did intend to write into the act section 126, because the standing committees of the House did not have the subpena power, and that the only time they wanted to give that power, as I understood then and understand now, was in the creation of special committees under resolutions providing for such power. Does the distinguished Senator remember anything about that discussion?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I cannot answer the question with definiteness, Mr. President, but I have heard words like that somewhere.

Mr. WHERRY. It seems that in referring to the history of the Reorganization Act and the debate on it in the Senate and in the House that point is left out. I think it is very important. Within the past 24 hours I talked with a distinguished Member of the House, who is now a member of the minority party, who told me that the House did not intend to surrender the right to create special committees. That was because of a situation which developed when years ago too many fishing trips were taken by a standing committee which had the power of subpena. It caused difficulty, and Members of the House thought the thing to do was by resolution to grant the subpena power to special committees when it was asked for in particular instances. I am sure that somewhere along the line I have heard that in the early hearings of the joint committee that had this under consideration.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the able Senator from Nebraska if it is not a fact that under the Reorganization Act, as the committees have now been set up, the standing committees have the subpena power?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Therefore the argument that it is necessary to have special committees in order that authority to subpena witnesses may be conferred is not sound, since such authority has now been given to the standing committees. That is an additional reason why no special committee should be created by the Congress.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I do not wish to break into the statement of the Senator from Utah giving what appears to be a chronological history of the Reorganization Act which ought to go in the RECORD. So if it is agreeable to the Senator from Maryland this colloquy may appear following the speech of the Senator from Utah.

I should like to point out to the distinguished Senator from Utah, however, in answer to the observation made by the distinguished Senator from Maryland that the very reason the House eliminated section 126 was that, in accordance with the history and traditions of the House, they wanted to grant the subpena power only when they set up a special committee. For that reason they opposed section 126, and deleted it from the bill. In the conference, that was the reason they assigned for deleting it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to prolong this interlude, but I should like to point out that we are not dealing with a House resolution here, we are dealing with a Senate resolution. I should like further to point out that former Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin, in the closing days of the session, did not want to accept the House proposal, but was forced to do so in the spirit of expediency and compromise, because of the approaching end of the life of the Congress.

Mr. WHERRY. That is true.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the question again comes down to this—and I shall not now argue it—that there is absolutely nothing, in fact almost minus nothing, if that is possible, which a special committee purports to do that the standing committees are not authorized to do, equipped to do, and can do a great deal better than the special committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree with the distinguished Senator so far as the Senate is concerned, but that was not the point I raised. As a matter of information, I asked whether the Senator could advise us as to the situation in the House, which is where the difficulty arose.

There is no dispute over what the Senate did, but the law which was passed did not contain the provision outlawing special committees. It is my opinion, as I think the distinguished Senator from Utah will agree as he reviews the history of what happened in the joint committee, that the main reason the House did not go along with that provision was the mechanical reason I have given relative to the procedure of standing committees. The practice which is still in vogue in the House is to create special committees, cutting across the standing committees, to give such special committees the subpena power, and not to give it to the standing committees. It is not now given by the House to standing committees.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I think no one need recall anything from memory; I think the record itself shows that both what the Senator from Maryland has said, as well as what the Senator from Nebraska has said, is thoroughly consistent with the facts as to the way in which the two Houses acted.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The fact that the subpena power is given to the Senate standing committees merely proves that in our minds we were thinking of making the standing committees powerful and enabling them to go into any field that might be desirable. One of the sections that was eliminated from the reorganization bill while it lay on the Speaker's table in the other House was section 126, which banned special committees. What the motives of the House leaders were in thus emasculating or denuding the Senate-approved bill in such a fashion I have no idea, but the effect of their action was to deny the membership of the entire House of Representatives an opportunity to express their will with respect to the proposed ban, as well as with respect to other stricken sections.

Therefore it was not the House of Representatives but a few leaders thereof who are responsible for the amputation of the reform bill and for the deletion of the ban on special investigating committees.

Thus amended, the reorganization measure came back to the Senate on July 26 for our consideration. The Senate sponsors of the bill were anxious to restore, as affecting the Senate at least, the provisions which had been stricken on the House side, including the ban on special committees, but it was too late in the session to risk sending the bill to conference. Members of the House were leaving town in large numbers, and there was grave danger that the conference report would fail of acceptance in the other body because of the absence of a quorum.

In order to salvage what was left of the original bill, former Senator La Follette moved that the Senate concur in the House amendments, and the Senate so concurred, but in so moving and acting neither former Senator La Follette nor the other Senate members of the joint committee, nor the Senate itself, yielded their original conviction as to the desirability of prohibiting the establishment of special committees in the future.

It is an erroneous interpretation of what happened on that occasion to say that in the Legislative Reorganization Act Congress expressly refused to abolish special committees. We yielded to a parliamentary situation. We have not changed our minds.

The passage of the legislative reorganization bill last July met with overwhelming public approval. To veteran correspondents in the press galleries, its passage was a legislative miracle, making Capitol Hill a new "beat" to cover. The press of the Nation hailed the act as a skillful combination of the ideal and the practicable. In signing it President Truman described the law as "one of the most significant advances in the organization of Congress since 1789."

A comparison of the Reform Act with the 37 recommendations of our joint committee shows that 24 of the joint committee's proposals were fully incorporated in the new law, six were partially provided for either in the act itself or in supplemental legislation, and seven failed of enactment. Quantitatively, the act embodies 80 percent of the original recommendations of the joint committee. Of the seven omitted recommendations, three were of major importance, in my opinion:

First. That for a joint legislative-executive council.

Second. That for a director of congressional personnel, and Third. The recommended ban on special committees.

WHY SPECIAL COMMITTEES SHOULD BE BANNED

On grounds of principle and legislative efficiency, there are several reasons why I think that special committees should be discontinued. In his remarks on this subject in the Senate last Monday, the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] summed up the arguments succinctly. I think so much of those arguments, which are short, that I shall read them to the Senate, so the Senate may again have the benefit of them, and so as to complete, in this one place, the history of what has taken place in regard to committees. The Senator from Oregon advanced the following reasons why special committees should be banned:

First. The jurisdiction of the standing committees has been so comprehensively described in the reformed rules as to cover every conceivable subject of legislation. Thus, to create a special committee is to trespass upon the assigned jurisdiction of some standing committee.

Second. The standing committees of the Senate have been authorized by the Legislative Reorganization Act to exercise continuous oversight of the execution of the laws by the administrative agencies within their respective jurisdictions. They are being equipped with professional staffs and expert investigators to assist them in performing their oversight function and have been armed with the subpena power for this purpose. Hereafter the investigatory function of Congress should be performed by its standing committees which have been empowered and equipped for the purpose instead of relying upon special investigating committees which are sporadic in nature and cannot introduce legislation to give effect to their recommendations.

Mr. President, I pause in my reading from the Senator from Oregon, to give an illustration. In the midst of the war, after the creation of the Special Committee on Postwar Planning, which was headed by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee had worked out what we thought was more or less a model housing bill, but it was untimely because it could not then be effective. The need existed, but the bill was untimely in its execution. As sponsor of the bill I felt it was even wrong to present the bill to the Senate at that time, and I suggested to the Senate that we make an exception to our rules, and that the bill be referred to the Special Committee on Postwar Planning for its consideration, due to the fact that it fitted practically into what were the fundamentals of that committee's activities and also it was in harmony with the theory behind that committee's scope of activities for the postwar period.

I asked that the bill be referred to the Special Committee on Postwar Planning. The Parliamentarian said it was in order, and the Senate permitted the reference. But in a day or two I was reminded that such action was contrary to the Senate rules. The bill was sent back from the special committee, and of course referred to a standing committee, which was as it should be. The reason why I asked that the bill be referred to the special committee was that if it were practical at that time for the committee to take jurisdiction over it, it would have served a beneficial purpose. But the special committee did not take jurisdiction; probably it could not take jurisdiction.

I mention that case to show that even though it may be thought desirable to refer a bill to a special committee which is engaged in studying the subject matter with which the bill is concerned, it may not be practical so to refer it, because of the question of timing, and that a standing committee probably is much better informed and better able to make recommendations to the Senate respecting the subject matter. Therefore I think standing committees should act upon various measures which may be proposed.

I read further from the statement made by the Senator from Oregon:

Third. The reformed Senate rules limit Senators to service on two standing committees each so that they can meet their legislative responsibilities more effectively. If, in addition, Senators are appointed to serve on special committees, the burdens of committee work will be correspondingly multiplied and the old evils of poor attendance and scattered attention will return.

Fourth. Creation of one or two special committees now will pave the way for the establishment of a rash of special committees with inevitable duplication of the work of the standing committees and unnecessary large-scale expenditures. It might also lead to a revival of the use of staff personnel borrowed from downtown departments with all the disadvantages of that practice.

I am sure the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] will endorse those words uttered by the Senator from Oregon.

Fifth. Creation of special committees to deal with subjects already assigned to standing committees will also be a burden to, and impair the efficiency of, the executive agencies of the Government by requiring their officials to repeat their testimony on the same subjects before several committees of the Senate.

During the first part of the war much of the press of the country had one standing criticism respecting congressional committees, and editorial after editorial was written on the subject. That criticism was that the Chief of Staff of the Army, the admiral at the head of the Navy, and individuals who had charge of war activities generally, were called to appear before one committee and then called to appear before another committee, and so on. I am very thankful, Mr. President, that Congress has reorganized the committees dealing with the armed services, so that hereafter there will not be the duplication of effort which occurred during the late war and the division which formerly existed in the departments engaged in the field of national defense or "common defense," as it is called in the new law. The heads of the various departments will now appear before one group of Senators and one group of Representatives, and that practice will tend toward the development of expert knowledge among the members of the respective committees.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to call the Senator's attention to what happened during the Seventy-ninth Congress in connection with the matter the Senator is now discussing. During that Congress the Senator from Illinois was chairman of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Special committees had to have their requests for money to carry on investigations approved by my committee. At one time there were three special committees in the Senate investigating surplus property. I was told that in addition there were also committees in the House of Representatives investigating the same subject. No doubt that is true. I am further told that General Gregory appeared one day before a special committee of the Senate and was kept practically all day before that committee giving testimony; that the following day he appeared before another committee of the Senate, giving the same testimony; and the third day he was summoned to the House of Representatives to give the same testimony over there on surplus property. That is an example of what the Senator is talking about—taking the time of important men in the executive branch of the Government of the United States and constantly bringing them before committees to go over the same subject-matter time and time again. If the Reorganization Act functions as the Senate said it should function in the debates we had when we passed the bill, when the time comes for these men from the executive branch of the Government to come to the Hill to testify, they can go before either one full committee or a subcommittee of a full committee. Then we shall eliminate the duplication of effort, waste of time, and waste of manpower which was unavoidable under the system which existed when we had special investigating committees.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I thank the Senator from Illinois. No one knows better than the former chairman of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate the confusion which resulted because of the various requests for continuation of select committees.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] brings out an additional point on exactly the same subject:

Sixth. Sporadic inquiries by select committees lack continuity and fail to provide the members of standing committees with direct knowledge of the information gathered. In cases where legislative action is indicated, standing committees find is necessary to do much of the work over again.

Seventh. Special investigations should be conducted by subcommittees of the reorganized standing committees having jurisdiction of the subject matter involved. Thus, for example, inquiries into the condition of small business might well be assigned to a standing subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Eighth. On June 10, 1946, the Senate approved of the ban on special committees by a vote of 49 to 16 in passing the La Follette bill.

Ninth. Modernization of the congressional committee structure, achieved by the Legislative Reorganization Act, was the keystone in the arch of congressional reform. To set up a series of special committees now would be a regressive step that might lead to the ultimate destruction of this fundamental reform.

I think the whole Senate should thank the Senator from Oregon for summing up his reasons as concisely as he has done. Perhaps some of my colleagues may wish that I were as concise. I have already consumed considerable time.

There is one further argument I should like to add to the cogent statement of the distinguished Senator from Oregon. While some special committees in the past have been "black sheep," some truly progressive committees in recent years have made a major contribution to public understanding of our economic and social problems. I applaud their achievements. But I say that all the advantages which are claimed for the special committee technique can now be enjoyed by our reorganized and newly staffed standing committees and their subcommittees. Armed with the power of subpena and staffed with expert investigators and empowered to keep constant watch over the activities of the executive agencies within their jurisdiction, there is no reason why our great standing committees of the Senate should not serve the Congress and the country as well as certain outstanding special committees have done in the past.

It was a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor which conducted the great civil liberties investigation before the war. It was the standing subcommittees on War Mobilization and Reconversion and Surplus Property of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in the Seventy-ninth Congress whose inquiries and reports contributed so much to the intelligent guidance and ventilation of these problems.

I hope that the newly elected Members of the Senate, who have not yet given hostages to fortune, will seriously weigh these arguments.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. During the course of his remarks the Senator from Utah was discussing the work of special committees, and the difficulty of obtaining attendance of committee members during sessions of the Senate. I am reminded that under the new Reorganization Act we have set forth certain rules, regulations, and restrictions, in some instances, upon our regular standing committees, one of which is that they shall not meet during a session of the Senate, unless by special permission. Would such restrictions apply to a special committee, or would it be entirely free from the rules which we have established for the guidance and direction of standing committees?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Under the old rules, special committees should have obtained permission to hold sessions during sessions of the Senate. Under the new rules I do not believe that that subject is covered, because it was assumed that we would not have special committees. However, the standing committees are not supposed to meet while the Senate is in session, without permission.

Mr. FERGUSON obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a point of no quorum?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, we have before us at the present time for debate the question of the adoption of a resolution to continue the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. The resolution was reported by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS]. It would extend the authority of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. That committee's authority had been extended to January 29, 1947. The purpose of the resolution is to continue during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eightieth Congress the authority of that special committee.

Earlier today the Senator from Maine had proposed an amendment which would strike out lines 12 and 13 of the original resolution, and would insert in lieu thereof the following: "defense program); is hereby continued during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eightieth Congress (except as hereinafter provided): Provided, That on and after the date this resolution is agreed to, the authority contained in such Senate Resolution 71 shall be limited, with respect to the subject matter authorized to be studied and investigated therein, to excessive profits, fraud, corruption, waste, extravagance, mismanagement, incompetence, and inefficiency in expenditures, connected with the prosecution of the national defense program for World War II: Provided further, That the committee shall report to the Senate the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations, as soon as practicable, but in no event later than January 31, 1948, at which time all powers and duties conferred upon the committee shall terminate."

Mr. President, during the previous discussion on the subject of the resolution now before the Senate, it has been suggested by some Members of the Senate that the burden of proof is upon those who favor the continuation of the Senate Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. Since that statement has been made and since the Senate, in order to act with the full facts before it, would be obliged to turn to those who have served on special committees for the information which would constitute proof of the need of the continuance of such committees, I feel impelled to lay before the Senate the facts within my knowledge as to the Special Senate Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program and the considerations which, in my judgment, make it imperative in the interest of government by the people that that committee be permitted to complete its work.

Had this challenge to present proof not been made, I would have been reluctant to express myself on this question, because, in a sense, it is my own work, as well as the work of other members of the Truman-Mead committee, which is now subject to attack. But, Mr. President, having been for 4 years a member of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program, and therefore having some special knowledge of the committee, I feel called upon to present the facts which I think are conclusive in demonstrating that this special committee should be continued. I have gladly devoted a great deal of my time to the work of the special committee. I have done so because I considered the committee a valuable instrumentality of the Senate in the effort to make our form of government work.

In my judgment, the question before the Senate today is one of major importance, because it involves the effectiveness of a republic in our modern, complicated society.

The thought I have in mind can be no better expressed than by using the words of the former chairman of the committee, now the President of the United States, with whom I had the privilege of serving, on the occasion of his resignation as chairman of the committee. In this body, on August 7, 1944, President Truman, then Senator Truman, said:

> The work of this committee has demonstrated what can be accomplished through investigation by a committee of the Congress. Our industrial economy has become so complex and the necessary changes so numerous that it is impossible for the Congress in legislating to provide all the safeguards that are necessary for proper administration. If an attempt were made to do so, great delays would ensue, and in many cases the detailed requirements of specific legislation would be harmful rather than beneficial.
> For these reasons it is important that Congress not only continue but enlarge its work of investigation. In my opinion, the power of investigation is one of the most important powers of the Congress. The manner in which that power is exercised largely will determine the position and the prestige of the Congress in our future. An informed Congress is a wise Congress, and an uninformed Congress surely will forfeit a large portion of the respect and confidence of the people.
> The days when Webster, Clay, and Calhoun personally could familiarize themselves with all the major matters with respect to which they were called upon to legislate are gone forever. No Senator or Congressman, no matter how able or diligent, can hope himself to master all the facts necessary to legislate wisely.
> The accomplishments of the Truman committee (and I am referring now to the other members of the committee and its staff rather than just to myself) present an example of the results that can be obtained by making a factual investigation with a good staff. Similar accomplishments can be made by other special committees, and I particularly urge upon the Senate that it be liberal in providing ample funds for the prosecution of proper investigation. The cost of a good investigation is negligible when compared with the results that can be obtained.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I wonder why the Senator has changed his mind since we had the debate last summer on this very question.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I say to the able Senator from Illinois that I have not changed my mind.

Mr. LUCAS. If I correctly understood the Senator's last statement, it seems to me that he is in favor of any law concerning investigations that will bring forth certain things which he has discussed. If I did not misunderstand what the Senator said, that was the point the able Senator made last summer. I know the Senator from Michigan took part in the debate on the reorganization bill and, at least by implication, supported the bill, including the provision eliminating all special committees and calling for the abolishment of all special committees. That is what the Senator from Michigan did when the bill was before the Senate.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I shall answer that point during the course of my remarks.

What I was doing when I was asked to yield was reading the remarks made by President Truman, then Senator Truman, when he resigned as chairman of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program.

Mr. LUCAS. I regret that I misunderstood. However, I assume that the Senator from Michigan will adopt those remarks as his own, if he was reading them. But if that now is his position, perhaps I was wrong in interrogating him as I did.

Mr. FERGUSON. I do adopt those remarks; otherwise, I would not have read them into the RECORD.

Mr. LUCAS. That is what I thought. So that brings me back to the same question, namely, if the Senator was so determined last year to eliminate special committees—and he voted to do so, and he played a part in doing so by his vote here in the Senate—it is difficult for the Senator from Illinois to understand the change of heart and mind, overnight, of the able Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, when the vote on this question is taken, I think it will be interesting for us to bear in mind that on the side of the aisle to which I now point will be found a repudiation of what the President of the United States, then Senator Truman, had in mind when he made to the Senate the statement I have just read.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. I should like to have the RECORD show clearly which side of the aisle the Senator referred to in the statement he made just a moment ago.

Mr. FERGUSON. I had my hand pointed to the minority. I say that in order that the RECORD may be clear.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, it will be a sorry day for America when the Senate of the United States curbs or throttles its power to find out about the people's business and renders itself unable to penetrate the shroud of secrecy with which administrative officials are prone to clothe their administrative mistakes and their administration of the people's affairs.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator from Michigan, as indicated by the last statement, contend that no investigation of the kind and character he is now discussing can be made under the Reorganization Act?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I answer the question by saying that if the Senate undertakes to investigate the entire war effort by the standing committees of the Senate, there will occur exactly what I have said would happen; and I say to the Senator from Illinois that time is of the essence. There were occasions when we were told that because military secrets were involved we could not go into the files and the records of the administration. The time has now arrived when, because of the declaration by the President of the United States that hostilities have ceased, we can for the first time expect to be able to look into the activities of these various agencies.

Mr. President, I say to the Senate today that time is of the essence, because it is a matter of record, and it is known, that files formerly in existence are not now in existence. I say that speed is necessary in this investigation.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. Not at this time. I wish to say to the Senate that last year a Member of the present minority, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] proposed to the Senate the creation of a permanent joint investigating committee. That proposal came before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] was chairman, and that committee, of which I was a member, voted to report the proposal, because we believed that a permanent joint investigating committee was necessary so that all the committees, the whole Senate, and all the people of the country, could know what had happened with the money which had been appropriated.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. HILL. One reason why I voted to report the bill was in order that we might have one committee and avoid the creation of many special committees. I will add that in my opinion the Reorganization Act does substantially what we had in mind in reporting that bill by giving to the Committee on Expenditures the power to make investigations.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I was just coming to that point.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to have the Senator answer my question, if he will, instead of making a long speech about something else. I should like to have him answer this one question, Whether or not he contends that under the Reorganization Act as passed, which he apparently supported last year, the Committee on Armed Services, headed by the able Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] or the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, headed by the able Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], has less power, ability, and capacity to do as good a job of investigating war profits as the select committee the Senator is now discussing?

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall come to that.

Mr. LUCAS. Just come to it now.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am going to answer the question, but not in the language of the Senator from Illinois. I am going to answer in my own language, and say what I believe, and I am going to read from the Reorganization Act to show the facts.

I wish to say that the new Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which committee I am a member, does not have the staff and will be unable to obtain the staff in time, and will be unable to review all the complaints and all the circumstances and read all the testimony the special committee has collected, covering literally thousands of pages. That is why I say it is necessary to continue the special committee. That is an answer to the question.

Mr. President, in the interest of democracy, in the interest of informing our citizens about their own public affairs, in the interest of providing those facts without which intelligent decisions cannot be formed, the crying need of the hour is not to limit but to expand the investigative function of the Congress.

The investigative function of Congress is, in my opinion, one of its most important functions. It is the means whereby legislators may inform themselves on the subject matter concerning which they contemplate legislation. Since Congress is the policy-making branch of our Government, before arriving at a policy it is necessary to obtain the facts and look into all conditions. The investigative power of Congress is of equal importance in examining the manner in which administrative bureaus carry out the duties which have been entrusted to them under the statutes. The investigative power of Congress is the means through which Congress may, if it has the courage to do so, recall unto itself the legislative authority which, in the past decade, it has permitted itself to lose, through the delegation of broad authority to the executive branch of the Government.

Those who now advocate destroying the Truman-Mead committee have resorted to an extremely ingenious strategy. They seek to place those advocating the continuance of the committee in the light of opposing the spirit and purpose of the act reorganizing Congress. I, for one, refuse to be placed in that position. We could tell from the questions of the Senator from Illinois that the very purpose is to draw a red herring across the trail so as to obscure the real issue, and to suggest that Senators who voted for the original reorganization bill, which was not passed by both Houses, but passed alone by the Senate, now want to violate the spirit of the act.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FERGUSON. Not at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, there is no stronger advocate than I for the modernization of the structure of the Congress. The reorganization bill was altogether too slow in coming. The former majority, now the minority, did not see fit to reorganize the Congress, even though they had complete control of the Congress for many years. But it has been reorganized, though the Reorganization Act, excellent as it is, has not, in my judgment, completely brought the Congress up to date, so that it is fully able to discharge its policy-making functions in our modern complicated economy.

Anyone who has had any experience with such matters must realize that effective investigations require a great deal of work of which the public, or for that matter even members of the Senate who are not directly concerned, have little or no knowledge whatever. For example, the public hearings conducted by our committee on the Garsson case ran from July 1 to July 29, 1946, but the complaint was received by the committee in the late spring of 1945. Between the receipt of the complaint and the holding of the public hearings, there was over a year of intensive work. This was not alone the work of just one investigator, but several investigators of the committee, as well as a force of auditors of the General Accounting Office. There was also considerable work on the part of officials in various branches of the War Department. Furthermore, the committee held six executive hearings before any public announcement of the investigation was made.

After the Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program conducted the hearing and it became public, we now discover in the press that a grand jury has been called by the Department of Justice of the United States to look into these facts.

I say to the Senate that if during the war the Department of Justice had done its full duty the Senate would not now have to investigate the fraud and the corruption that have been going on in the administrative agencies. But, Mr. President, until we pointed out the facts in the Garsson case, the Justice Department saw fit to do nothing about the case. It was only when it became public that they stepped in and laid it before a grand jury.

It is very significant that we now hear this opposition to an investigation. A few days after the election, because of the change in the majority in the Congress of the United States, I felt there would be opposition. We merely want to disclose the facts.

The pattern in the Garsson case is the same as has been used by the Truman-Mead committee during its entire history. It has sought the facts and has dug for the facts through its investigators weeks and months before the public ever hears about it. This is the secret of the success that it has had.

Not only has this preparatory work been responsible for successful investigations, but it has been in the interest of fairness to those against whom complaints have been made to the committee. The Members of this body have no conception of the number of complaints which have been referred to our committee and which, after preliminary investigation, have been rejected as not deserving of public hearings by the committee. The very fact, when announced publicly, that the committee is investigating a certain firm or a certain department is interpreted by the press and the public as indicating that there is something wrong with that firm or that department. The preliminary investigation permits the committee to avoid unjust condemnation in the public eye by assuring itself in advance that the subject warrants thorough public investigation.

The Reorganization Act provides in section 132 as follows:

> Except in time of war or during a national emergency proclaimed by the President, the two Houses shall adjourn sine die not later than the last day (Sundays excepted) in the month of July in each year unless otherwise provided by the Congress.

Today, almost 2 weeks of the first session of the Eightieth Congress have already passed and we all know that not one of the newly organized 15 committees of the Congress is staffed, provided with funds, and organized so as to proceed at once with investigative work. We all know that it will take some time before that is possible.

I was not a Member of the Senate when the Truman committee was organized. Resolution 71 of the Seventy-seventh Congress was adopted on March 1, 1941. The original members of the committee were appointed on March 8, 1941. Mr. Hugh Fulton was appointed chief counsel of the committee's staff on March 31, 1941. The first public hearing of the committee was held on April 15, 1941, 6 weeks after the committee had been created, and it consisted principally in listening to prepared statements by the Secretary and the Under Secretary of War. The committee's first interim report on aluminum—Report No. 480, part 5, of the Seventy-seventh Congress—was filed on June 26, 1941. The first annual report of the committee was filed on January 15, 1942, 10½ months after the committee was created.

The Reorganization Act was revolutionary. How revolutionary, we will probably learn during the eightieth session of Congress. We are now groping our way. We are at the very beginning of the session. Let us not act hastily and destroy a useful instrument of the Senate before we have provided ourselves, in actuality, with other and better instruments to take its place. No one is more convinced than I that the investigative function should be exercised by the Congress more effectively than it has been done in the past, and I am convinced that many investigations which will be useful to the country can be conducted by the regularly constituted standing committees if only we will provide those committees with adequate investigative staffs and funds. The great bulk of the investigative work in the past has been done by special committees, with an uncertain and tenuous existence, constantly required to seek additional funds from the Senate, and in the past sometimes required to recruit their personnel by borrowing from the Federal agencies, some of which were under investigation. I am also fully aware of the weakness of the special committee unless it is given specific power to recommend legislation, a power which most of them have not had in the past. They have been limited to investigating and reporting.

The argument that the immediate destruction of the Truman-Mead committee is necessary to avoid jurisdictional conflicts with the newly organized committees of the Senate will not bear close scrutiny. There were standing committees under the old structure of the Congress, and the Truman-Mead committee, in its 6 years of existence, did not invade the field of these standing committees nor duplicate their work. On the contrary, Senators, time and again, have complimented the work of the Truman-Mead committee and have praised the useful service it has rendered Senators individually, Senate committees, and the Senate itself in discharging our responsibilities to the people. Not only need there be no conflict in jurisdiction with other committees under the reorganized Congress, but it is precisely when these committees are establishing themselves in the execution of the investigative function on a permanent basis that the Truman-Mead committee can be of greatest assistance in transmitting to these newly organized committees, at their request, the experience, know-how, and investigative techniques which have been gained during the past 6 years. As the staffs of the new committees are assembled and the preliminary investigating work proceeds and the standing committees commence to function in fields where the Truman-Mead committee has hitherto done work, it will be a very simple matter for the Truman-Mead committee to withdraw from those fields and prepare its final report to the Senate.

Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment proposed by the able Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] is to limit the jurisdiction of the special committee, but to enable it to perform the services which in the opinion of the sponsors of the resolution, and I am sure of all Senators who will vote for it, should be performed. There is a job to be done and it cannot be done by the other committees at the present time.

The work the Truman-Mead committee has done in various fields can be made available to the standing committees interested therein, but this work, representing the investment of substantial funds of the Senate and the time and effort of the staff and the members of the committee, will be wholly lost if the committee is abruptly destroyed.

It seems to me it is incumbent upon those who allege that the work of the Truman-Mead committee will invade the jurisdiction of the standing committees to cite instances in which this has occurred in the past.

During the war, the committee frequently refused to comment upon decisions made by military and naval supply officers or to insist on receiving information labeled secret, on the ground that it did not wish to run any risk, however slight, of interfering with combat operations. The committee simply urged that the agencies themselves reexamine programs which appeared to the committee to be extravagant or unwise and warned that public officials should bear in mind that the day would come when the shroud of secrecy would be removed and the people would demand an accounting. I say to the Senate that that day has arrived, and no time should be lost in removing the shroud of secrecy and telling the people what was done under the circumstances of war.

If the move to destroy this committee is now successful, that accounting may never be had.

When the Senate strikes down its own agency, there will be rejoicing among those who have just cause to fear the spotlight of a senatorial inquiry.

So that the record may be complete, I should like to read to Senators at this point a few of the comments which have been made concerning the work of the Truman-Mead committee by public officials whose work has been the subject of the committee's investigations. I read excerpts from an address by the Honorable Kenneth C. Royall, Under Secretary of War, at the American Legion Victory Day observance, Washington, N. C., August 14, 1946. In speaking of the investigation of the Garsson case by the Special Senate Committee Investigating the National Defense Program, Under Secretary Royall said:

By its investigation the committee has performed a public service of high order—not only for the country, but also for the War Department.

The committee has rendered a great service to the American people in exposing other conduct, a part of which was at least reprehensible and some of which may well prove to have been criminal. This committee, including all its members and its counsel, has been diligent and determined in its investigation.

The War Department appreciates the evidence which the committee has developed.

I also wish to read excerpts from a statement made on May 9, 1946, by the Honorable James Forrestal, Secretary of the Navy, at a public hearing of the Special Senate Committee Investigating the National Defense Program, concerning the diversion and improper procurement of Navy provisions and supplies in the naval ammunition depot, the ship's service store of the submarine base, and the so-called civilian housing area No. 3 at the navy yard, all in or near Pearl Harbor, T. H., as follows:

I would like to begin by saying that I think the services of this committee have been most useful, first in directing attention to the abuses that subsequent investigation developed, and I don't want to unduly compliment the functions of a legislative investigating committee, but I think that, seriously speaking, this whole series of incidents illustrates the proper use of a legislative committee in aiding an executive department to carry out its duties. I say that without any reservations.

Further I read an excerpt from the book The Industry—Ordnance Team, by Lt. Gen. Levin Hicks Campbell, Jr., United States Army Chief of Ordnance 1942–1946, published in 1946. In chapter 1, in speaking of the Ordnance Department's encouragement of investigations of itself by congressional committees, General Campbell says:

One of the most helpful of these committees was the Truman committee, now known as the Mead committee. When a group of the importance and ability of the Truman committee paid Ordnance a visit, we did all that we could to show committee members what they wanted to see—and everything else we thought might be of interest to them.

I wish also to read excerpts from a book written by one who was not connected with the Army or the Navy but was the head of the War Production Board, Donald M. Nelson. I read excerpts from his book Arsenal of Democracy (New York, 1946). On page 128 appears the following language:

This was the origin of a long series of encounters between myself and Congress, which I really enjoyed and which, I believe, had a salutary effect on defense and war production activities. Bureaus appointed by the Executive were very lucky to be weighed and assayed by an investigating group as honest, impartial, and objective as Senator Truman's committee. * * *

I always enjoyed tremendously the little brushes which we had with Harry Truman's investigators, who were invariably able men.

And on page 394:

The famous Truman committee likewise had been looking ahead. On March 4, 1944, it issued its third annual report, a piece of work extremely sound, like everything which this committee did.

The Congress voted funds and granted power to the administration to spend billions of dollars of the people's moneys and to risk the lives of our citizens in the war effort. Congress assumed the duty and responsibility to the people to investigate the spending of the funds and the administration of the power and to make certain that mistakes were recognized and corrected as soon as possible and to show that the money was properly spent and every precaution taken for the protection of the lives of our men in the service.

Mr. President, as one of the members of the Appropriations Committee, I wish to say that that committee did not have a sufficient staff, and did not have the time, and could not look into the details of the expenditure of the money which was being asked for during the war, but the committee approved appropriation of money in a lump sum of as much as $8,000,000,000 at one time, because it felt that the Congress of the United States could look into the matter and investigate the expenditure of the funds appropriated, and account to the people of the United States as to what had happened to the money. Are we now to forsake that duty and say to the people, "Oh, yes; we will have no investigation of what was done with those billions of dollars"? Mr. President, I am sure the Congress does not wish to forsake that duty.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I want the Senator from Michigan to know that I do not care how much the Senate investigates the billions of dollars spent during the war so long as the investigation is conducted under the new Reorganization Act. But I should like to ask the Senator this question. If we are to investigate the expenditure of $400,000,000,000, which was spoken of by my colleague the other day, and which is now being spoken of by the Senator from Michigan, I ask the Senator whether he thinks that can be done by January 1, 1948.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will answer by saying that with the amount of information the special committee has in its hands it can do a reasonably good job unless it is throttled by the various agencies of government that are to be investigated. If we can get the cooperation of the various departments, including the Department of Justice, in my humble opinion this committee will be able to point out what has taken place. At least it can furnish a pattern which will be of great aid in the future if this country ever faces a war such as we have had—God forbid!—but we should not now close the books and say, "We are unable to profit by the experience of the past war."

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator expect any objections or intrusions upon the part of the executive agencies, in view of the experiences which he has had on the Truman committee?

Mr. FERGUSON. We have had some rather severe objections. I remember that on two occasions it was necessary to subpena the records of the Attorney General of the United States in order that we might get the facts.

Mr. LUCAS. If the Senator is talking about the money which has been spent through the War and Navy Departments, he has just finished telling the country about the great things which the Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of War have said about the Truman committee. I am wondering whether, in view of his use of the testimony of those men, he expects any unusual difficulties from the War or Navy Departments?

Mr. FERGUSON. I expect cooperation.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator has given us a clear indication that he does not expect it.

Mr. FERGUSON. That may be the opinion of the able Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator left the innuendo that if we can get cooperation from the executive agencies we can do this job within a reasonable length of time.

Mr. FERGUSON. I merely answered the question of the able Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I wish to find out whether the Senator had any unusual difficulties in securing that kind of cooperation when he was a member of the Truman committee, in view of the fact that he had already given the country quotations from the Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of War as to the great things the Truman committee has done.

Mr. FERGUSON. The committee has had difficulties. Naturally we expect cooperation in the future. I believe that the departments will probably wish to cooperate in the future, and give the greatest possible aid to the committee. It may be that because of the change in the Congress there will be a change in the administrative agencies.

To do this job, however, the Senate created a special committee to act as guardian of the powers of Congress, equipped it with wide authority to investigate, and ordered it to report currently to the Senate with respect to the administration of the war program. Before the job is done and a report of the findings fully made, it is now proposed that we dissolve the committee. Will anyone seriously argue that the present standing committees which are being formed, and whose staffs are not fully organized, with all the legislative work now before them during the Eightieth Congress, and without the background and the special knowledge of this committee as a result of its 6 years of investigating our war effort, could possibly be as efficient or as effective as the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program? It would require a year of intense study and work by a new standing committee and its staff to read and familiarize themselves with the information and knowledge which members of the staff of the special committee now have at their fingertips.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR. Am I to understand from what the Senator from Michigan has said that it is the intention of this committee, if it is reconstituted, to retain the same staff in its entirety?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I could not answer for the committee as a whole. I believe that the committee staff has functioned well. I would assume that the present staff, with some exceptions—probably some additions of more efficient men or women—would do this job. I anticipate no wholesale removal of the staff, because in the past this committee has done a fine job. Until election day there was not a minority report from the committee. There was no minority report from the committee until after November 5, 1946. So the staff, so far as I am concerned, is a nonpartisan, bipartisan staff serving the Senate of the United States.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator says that there were no bipartisan decisions until after the election of 1946. That brings to my mind the question upon which there was a division of opinion between Democrats and Republicans on the committee. On that point I should like to ask the Senator whether or not he construes the amendment which has been offered by the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] as giving to the committee the right, for example, if incompetency and inefficiency were found in the construction of an air base at Trinidad, to go to Trinidad to make an examination?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I am unable to answer for the committee. I am unable to answer for the chairman of the committee. I am assuming that I shall not be chairman of the committee. I could not answer the question.

Mr. LUCAS. It seems to me that it is important that we know whether or not under the terms of the resolution the committee is prepared, if it finds extravagance and mismanagement abroad, we will say, in the construction of an Army base in the occupied zone of Germany, to make that kind of an investigation. Would the committee have the power to go abroad to make that type of investigation?

Mr. FERGUSON. I will answer that question, because it has been discussed by the committee with members of the Committee on Armed Services. It is not my idea that the committee plans to leave the United States to go into Germany to do any investigating. That is not to say that I feel that the investigation should not be made. It was voted by the entire committee. But there have been changes, and certain things have happened. There has been an understanding between the Committee on Armed Services and the special committee that from this point on it is not the intention of the special committee to usurp one iota of the power and authority of the Committee on Armed Services. That would include the field of the present occupation of Germany, Japan, or any other place. The Committee on Armed Services will be glad to do its job.

Mr. LUCAS. As I understand, the amendment deals with war profiteering. Let me ask the Senator this question: Suppose that the investigators of the special committee were to discover that war profiteering took place in connection with an Army base in the occupied zone. I conceive it to be wholly within the power of the committee, if necessary, to go to the place in question and make an investigation.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. This amendment was drawn as a result of discussions in the Committee on Armed Services. That committee has pointed out the situation to which the Senator from Illinois has referred, and language has been drafted to deal with that question, confining the activities of the special committee within continental United States, and limiting it to transactions occurring prior to June 30, 1946.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I to understand, then, that in due course the Senator will offer an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes; in compliance with the suggestion of members of the Committee on Armed Services, in order to accomplish the very thing which the Senator has intelligently suggested.

Mr. LUCAS. In reading the resolution and the amendment to it I cannot understand why, taking either a strict or a liberal interpretation of it, almost anything in any place in the world could not be investigated where fraud, corruption, waste, and extravagance were found.

Mr. BREWSTER. In the discussion with the Committee on Armed Services that point was gone over, and it was exactly as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] says; and we were very happy to follow this language in accordance with their suggestion.

In dealing with the German situation there were two aspects of it. One was the charge of black marketing and other irregularities of the occupation troops. The charges were made by highly responsible officials just back from Germany, which in September the committee unanimously voted to investigate. The other aspect dealt with the occupation policy and the transfer from military to civilian control. That was a dominant factor. It began to present certain problems in foreign relations which gave concern to some of the members of the committee.

There was also a question of the Army situation. Most of the military men, including General Clay, are very much concerned that there should be a transfer to civilian control. The transfer from McNarney to Clay means, I assume, that the military will never be in favor of transfer to civilian control. The only obstacle hitherto had been that Secretary Byrnes declined to take on any more responsibilities of any character in his Department because of the administrative problems involved. It would be my hope and expectation that General Marshall, because of the military concern that the Army might be blamed for economic or social ideological problems, would perhaps feel far more amenable to such a transfer. But whatever may be the view, we are entirely happy to transfer the entire problem to the Committee on the Armed Services.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not want to get into any discussion as to our foreign policy. What I am trying to find out is what this resolution means, without going into what General Marshall is going to do or what Mr. Byrnes' policy is. I think I understand now that what the Senator proposes to do is finally to offer an amendment which will confine the investigation to continental United States.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. On that point I assume that what the Senator has reference to is that we will not go into any investigation of the occupation of Germany or Japan or any of the territory acquired during the war. I do not understand that that would exclude the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska, because we have a number of investigators there. I do not think it is within the sense of the matter brought up by the Committee on Armed Services that we would be foreclosed from any investigations in the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. LUCAS. I think the committee would be entitled to a trip or two. I am not going to be too technical on that point.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I understood that there had been a division in committee and that minority views were filed. What was that about?

Mr. FERGUSON. It was on the case of the Senator-elect from Mississippi. That is, the report was not unanimous.

Mr. HATCH. Then there were no minority views filed?

Mr. FERGUSON. I desire to correct my statement if I said minority views were filed. There was simply not unanimous agreement to the report.

Mr. HATCH. I thought maybe there was something I did not know about.

Mr. BREWSTER. Is it a fact that minority views have never been filed in the committee; but in one instance there was a dissenting vote on a report? Is not that correct?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I am glad that the Senator called that to my attention.

Mr. BREWSTER. That was on the Bilbo case?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Following the question propounded by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], I am not quite clear in my own mind as to what the new geographical limitation is going to be. I am thinking about South American matters where there were some expenditures made. Would they be within the limitations?

Mr. BREWSTER. The only episode in connection with that matter was the Inter-American Highway, and I think that our report on that is ready, so that there is no occasion for further exploration; although I will defer to the Senator from Michigan, who, I think, was chairman of the committee which considered that.

Mr. FERGUSON. I should say that if we want to complete that particular report there should be hearings of Mr. McDonald, Commissioner of the Public Roads Administration. That is all I know of at this time. Every member of the committee will remember that there are certain secret agreements which have always been withheld from the committee in relation to certain work in South America and in Central America. As to whether or not the committee might feel that under the terms "corruption," "extravagance," "inefficiency," and so forth, they should look into that, that is a question to be considered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. HATCH. On that point, unless a limitation is seriously made along the lines which the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] has suggested will be made, I do not think it would be possible to construe the language of the resolution limiting investigations of the committee to any place.

Mr. BREWSTER. Am I to understand that if we should limit the resolution it might have the approval of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HATCH. I will say to the Senator from Maine that in view of my announced position, made long ago, I intend to oppose the creation of any special committees. I do not think an amendment could be offered that would cause me to change my decision. But I think it is important that the Senate know just what functions are to be performed and what functions are possible in the event that this work should be extended. Is it contemplated or is it possible that the committee could go into South American countries and conduct investigations of expenditures made there?

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. So far as the South American picture is concerned, I have just returned from a trip there, which was not a junket, but which was paid for in good State-of-Maine money, and I have formed the impression that there are many current problems in South America concerning our defense which are going to occupy the immediate and intimate attention of both the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations. That is the very type of problem which, in my judgment, we should turn over to those committees. I hope they will give them immediate attention. We will give them the benefit of our files and records in this matter. So much of the problem is concerned with military and commercial policy that it is a subject which in my judgment we should go into a little further.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. A moment ago the Senator from Maine spoke about an agreement reached with the Committee on Armed Services. Will the Senator explain to the Senate what that agreement is?

Mr. BREWSTER. I believe the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] has the language which was discussed with the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, which committee suggested the interpolation in the amendment after the words "World War II" of these words:

within the Continental United States, prior to June 30, 1946.

The question whether or not that language could be construed to include Hawaii and Alaska, which was suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] and which is apparently agreeable to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], is a question on which I should like to receive further comment before the amendment is actually offered, recognizing the suggestion that the territorial limits of the United States might be within the scope of what was contemplated by the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the able Senator from Maine if he feels that the Committee on Armed Services is incapable of making the kind of investigation which he has reserved for the special committee in his resolution?

Mr. BREWSTER. Not at all incapable. I would say, rather, unprepared, in view of the things essential to this work, including the training, which we found in our own experience was a matter of many months. I think that would be also true when contemplating the problem of securing experts under the reorganized structure, as well as the problems of unification of the services, and universal military service. It seems to me, as I have previously stated to the Senator from Maryland, that our committee might well be considered for continuation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me ask the Senator a question. If the Committee on Armed Services were instructed to undertake the work set forth in the Senator's resolution, would it be feasible and possible to transfer to the Committee on Armed Services the staff to which the Senator has alluded, together with the files and the investigators which the committee already has?

Mr. BREWSTER. The only point is that it would not be possible to transfer the senatorial committee along with them. Although I do not wish to be immodest or to violate a Presidential confidence, nevertheless let me state that when I reported to the President that I had been named to fill, insofar as possible, the shoes which he had occupied, he suggested that we had had a considerable training in that field and should know something of the problems which we would face. So if it is not immodest, I would suggest that that suggestion be taken into account, along with our suggestion.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield to me?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say that I hope the genial Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] will see fit to interrupt these interrogatories at any time he desires to do so, because I do not wish to interfere with the continuity of his remarks.

I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a further question. He has already made out a very good case, in his colloquy with other Senators here, as to why the functions or the work to be performed by his committee in certain instances, namely, the South American matter to which he has just alluded, should be performed by the Committee on Armed Services. He has already said that he seeks to turn that particular part of the initiatory work of the special committee over to the Committee on Armed Services, as I have understood him. Is my understanding correct?

Mr. BREWSTER. It is not correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thought the Senator from Maine just said that he did not propose to have the special committee go outside the United States. I thought the Senator just said that there were certain commercial and military matters in South America which he was very glad to turn over to the Committee on Armed Services, and I thought the Senator said he hoped that committee would undertake to work there at an early date. Did I correctly understand him in that connection?

Mr. BREWSTER. Whenever the Senator from Maryland has concluded, I shall be glad to reply.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have concluded now, and I am waiting for the Senator to answer my questions.

Mr. BREWSTER. My position is that although under the scope of this resolution, as the Senator from Maryland has hitherto pointed out, we could practically take in, particularly in view of the basket clause at the end, the entire universe—past, present, and future—we are now undertaking to limit it, as the particular objections which have been made would indicate.

As to the South American matter, let me say that we have not spent any particular amount of time on the broader phases of the inquiry to which the Senator from Maryland has referred. There were some contracts of a rather unusual nature in that South American picture. I think our inquiries with respect to them have not extended over very many hours. The staff has done some work in that connection. We have had one or two executive hearings, but we have not had a public hearing on that subject. It relates to matters which may well invite exploration, which might well be within our scope, but which we have not undertaken to investigate. However, it does involve matters which in my judgment are going to be very much more significant in our current relationships as time goes on, and that is the precise type of thing as to which I think the more quickly it is turned over to the standing Committee on Armed Services and the standing Committee on Foreign Relations, the better it will be. That is my position.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan further yield to me?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. With the forbearance of the Senator from Michigan, let me say that the Senator from Maine is using a great many words to say, "Yes; the function should be turned over to the Committee on Armed Services, for the very reason that the Committee on Armed Services must find the remedies which exist."

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Maryland is entirely inaccurate in its assumption that the matters to which I refer are ones to which we on the committee have ever given particular attention, or with which our concern is more than, shall I say, 10 percent. The question of whether there were irregularities has never been presented to us. So, regardless of whether the contracts would even come within the scope of the activities and interest of the committee, and the contracts were of a very comprehensive nature, so far as I know there was never a suggestion that they were irregular or improper. However, they could be charged with that, I presume, although they have not been.

So the attempt, with the ingenious and intelligent approach of the Senator from Maryland, to involve this as a precedent which should then be enlarged, with a camel's nose under the tent, to assume all the responsibilities and authority which the committee has exercised, seems to me to be unwarranted.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I rose and asked the Senator from Maine the simple question of whether he said that he thought this South American question should be turned over for further exploration to the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. BREWSTER. But I did not say that it was a matter which we ourselves in any event were going to investigate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Neither did I.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Maryland assumed that.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I did not assume it. The Senator's imagination has gotten away from him in the course of his discussion.

Mr. BREWSTER. I followed the remarks of the Senator from Maryland as closely as I could.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator from Maine will read the RECORD tomorrow, he will see that there was no allusion to it in my remarks.

Mr. President, let me say that if the Senator from Maine uses the premise that because of the factors involved there, the South American matter should be investigated by the Committee on Armed Services, rather than by the special committee, then by the same logic the Committee on Armed Services should do the same thing in regard to matters here in the United States.

Mr. BREWSTER. I suggest that the Senator from Maryland present his arguments to his own committee, the majority of which have approved the continuance of the special committee. The Senator can present his arguments to them, rather than to us.

I think the question of jurisdiction in connection with the proposed continuation is perfectly clear. I can understand the desire of some of those who wish to see this work stopped, but I do not think we are obliged to defer to the alleged logic of the Senator from Maryland on that account.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan will further yield to me——

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator from Maine that by insinuation he has attributed to me and to others on this side of the aisle and to some of those on the other side of the aisle a course of action which is not contemplated by anyone who is opposing this investigation by the special committee, for I myself shall offer a resolution calling for the exact investigation, to be made by a standing committee of this body, which the Senator from Maine seeks to make. Therefore it cannot be said, even by way of insinuation or innuendo, that any of us are opposing this investigation. The resolution will be affirmative, and we shall have the committee whose function and duty it is to make that investigation, make it, for the further reason that when the investigation is concluded, it will be the Committee on Armed Services that will have to write the corrective legislation to prevent the abuses of war profiteering when contracts are let in the future, and at that time the special committee of the Senator from Maine will be out of existence, just as much as last year's bird's nest will be out of use.

Therefore, Mr. President, those who are going to write the legislation of a corrective nature should be the ones to saturate their minds with the facts involved, so that they can act first hand, not second hand, on that matter.

Accordingly, when the Senator from Maine says he has thrown overboard his proposed and rather brief and cursory investigation into the fields in South America, which lasted only a few hours in the committee, and inasmuch as the Senator from Maine seeks to have the Committee on Armed Services handle that matter henceforth, let me inquire what logic there is for not letting the Committee on Armed Services do the whole job, so that the members of that committee can write such legislation as may be necessary as it should be written?

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I appreciate the certain force of the suggestions of the Senator from Maryland. The only thing I suggest is that in the very friendly discussions which we had regarding the limitation of our scope it was not suggested at that time by the Senator from Maryland that in respect to any limitation which we might introduce in the interest of getting a modus vivendi to accomplish this problem he would immediately use any such limitation to which we would agree as a precedent for holding that we had therefore eliminated ourselves from the matter. I regret that the Senator from Maryland departs to that degree from what it seems to me are the amenities of friendly intercourse.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield once more.

Mr. TYDINGS. My frame is shaking with grief and remorse at this affront which has been given to the Senator from Maine. I am standing here almost beside myself, with a feeling that is so terrible in its ramifications that I hardly can find the words to tell the Senator how truly sorry I am.

Let me say that the Senator from Maine just made the statement that a majority of the Committee on Armed Services have agreed with some point of view which he has expressed. The Senator himself well knows there has been no meeting of the Armed Services Committee called for the purpose of agreeing or disagreeing, and whatever was done was ex officio, not binding on the committee, and cannot be cited as committee action, for no Democrat was asked to that meeting. Does the Senator mean to say that the majority have to take this matter behind closed doors and call in only the partisans, and put it up to them, and that the majority is afraid of these outnumbered Democrats who sit on this side of the aisle? I am astounded at the Senator. I thought his courage was at a higher level than that.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I merely wish to say that I am glad I did yield the last time, in order that the Senator from Maryland might clear his conscience.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think perhaps the RECORD should be complete. I think when the Senator reads the RECORD tomorrow, as I am sure he will, he will find the only language I used was that the majority of the committee had indicated their concurrence with the solution of this matter. However, I think it should be added also that I appeared at the request of the chairman before the full committee and stated fully my position, and had a most interesting and friendly colloquy with the Senator from Maryland, in which this matter was thoroughly gone over. I do not mean to intimate there were any agreements by the Senator from Maryland, but that he merely suggested—and I think I quote him correctly—if some limitations were introduced it might modify the ardor of his opposition. That was the extent to which he went, and I am still looking forward hopefully.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not desire to trespass further on the patience of the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. But I should like to say one word, and then I promise the Senator that, outside of a direct affront, nothing shall pry me from my seat.

I hope that neither the Senator from Maine nor other Senators on his side of the aisle, nor any Senators on this side will longer make the argument that what some of us are trying to do is to prevent an investigation into war-profits frauds and the matters covered by the resolution, for, as I have told the Senator, there will be offered an affirmative resolution for the performance by a regular committee of the Senate of exactly the work the Senator proposes to have done by the special committee. Therefore, it seems to me, in view of the statement I have made that, whatever has been preconceived, such an argument is not fair, and should not be indulged here, and I hope it will not be in the future.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. For what purpose?

Mr. HOLLAND. To ask for a clarification of a portion of the Senator's speech.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understood the Senator to say that the amendment was so drafted as to limit and confine investigations henceforth to those fields which it was desired to have investigated, and to preclude the special committee from going into other fields. I have understood from the colloquy between the Senators from Maryland and Maine, which has been most interesting, that it has heretofore been orally agreed, as between the proponents of the resolution and the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, at least two fields would not be entered by the special investigating committee from now on, namely, questions affecting the armies of occupation, and questions affecting matters of foreign affairs and commercial affairs, looking into the future. My question is, Whether or not there are other limitations, which are understood orally as between the proponents of the resolution and the amendment, and the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services?

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall have to answer that question by saying that if the Senate of the United States adopts the amendment, the amendment will be the limitation, except as explained here on the floor of the Senate, and there will be no personal, private agreements between any Members of the Senate.

Mr. HOLLAND. If the Senator will yield further——

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to ask a specific question of the distinguished Senator who has the floor, and whose exposition of this matter I think is so full. I also direct the inquiry to the Senator from Maine, if he cares to answer, because he has participated in the colloquy. My question is whether there are any other verbal understandings regarding this resolution with the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services; because if there are I think the Senate is entitled to know them.

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall answer first, and then ask the Senator from Maine to give his version. I know of no secret agreements, other than what is expressed here in the language.

Mr. HOLLAND. Other than those disclosed by the colloquy?

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator refer to the South American matter?

Mr. HOLLAND. The matter having to do with the not entering upon matters concerning the armies of occupation, and not going into questions which have primarily to do with foreign affairs and with commercial interests in the future.

Mr. FERGUSON. The question of looking into the occupation of Germany was a different question, and is entirely outside the language used in the instrument itself, so I am not including that as a secret agreement. It is outside the language.

Mr. HOLLAND. I might say that, as I understood the Senator from Maine, he agreed that the wording was sufficiently broad to have covered an investigation into matters in Germany, under certain conditions, and that it had been understood verbally between him and the chairman of the standing Committee on Armed Services that there should not be any such interpretation or any such action.

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I think there is a little confusion, in the first place, about secret agreements. I think that everything that was said on this matter was said by me in the full meeting of the Committee on Armed Services a few days ago. I am not sure whether or not the Senator from Florida was present. Is he a member of that committee?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am not. I may say that the word "secret" was introduced into the discussion by the able Senator from Michigan, not by me. The words I used in the colloquy were the very language used by the Senator from Maine, namely, oral agreements between him and the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think the Senator from Florida has misunderstood. I refer to the oral agreements which went on as the discussion proceeded with the chairman of the committee and the full committee. Then, the Senator from Maryland suggested that an amendment be prepared which would represent and embody these discussions. Such an amendment has been prepared, and was submitted to the chairman of the committee, as well as to the Senator from Maryland and others interested, and the chairman of the committee, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], suggested that it did not cover the point to which the Senator refers. So that additional phraseology was prepared, to be presented at whatever should be the appropriate times, as an amendment to the pending amendment, which would cover the point to which the Senator now refers.

The South American matter would simply be incidental to that. I mean, that would come within the scope of the amendment. So that it does not refer to any secret or oral agreements of any character.

Mr. HOLLAND. Would the Senator mind stating categorically whether there are any oral agreements other than what have been disclosed on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. BREWSTER. It is understood, so far as I know, that everything that has been said is embodied within the scope of the amendment and the amendment to it which will be presented.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. May I ask the Senator whether or not he would consider the investigation of housing a proper function of the committee, under the amendment?

Mr. FERGUSON. I did at the time it was suggested, and I do now, but it will not be covered now under what I take the language here to mean.

Mr. LUCAS. That is, the limitation would eliminate such an investigation?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct. Whatever housing investigation is undertaken will be finished the 30th of this month. I think it had a salutary effect upon the administration of housing, and what has been done up to date has been well worth while. I look at it as important in this respect, that if it had not been done, we probably would not have had regulations now.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator permit a further observation?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. My only reason for asking the questions is an effort to ascertain definitely what the resolution would do so far as an over-all investigation is concerned, because I think the Senator knows that once we delegate power to one of these investigating committees they do not pay much attention to what is in the allegations of the resolution. They go far afield many, many times. I have never known of a committee which did not go outside the scope of the allegations contained in the resolution, once it got its foot in the door and started an investigation.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I am looking forward to the time when as a Member of the Senate I can pass over to the various standing committees matters which come to my attention that should be investigated, because I think that we all know, based upon very good information, that a great deal of investigative work is to be done, and that all the committees will really be working at "full steam ahead," if they properly conduct the investigations. But I recall that when the Pearl Harbor joint committee had its hearings we ran full head into the famous Wyman case. It was referred to the War Investigating Committee, which took it up and appointed as chairman of the subcommittee the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], but nothing has been done in that famous case. I am hoping that something will be done, and I am waiting for the opportunity to advise the Army of that matter so that they can make an adequate investigation. Such an investigation will lead outside the continental United States.

Mr. President, since last Friday when the opposition to the continuance of the Truman-Mead committee first became apparent, I have sought to find the real reason behind this movement. One is reluctant to come to the conclusion that it proceeds from a fear of what the committee may expose. Of course, the opposition will not agree or admit that it is based on any such grounds, and the administration would not dare publicly admit that it seeks to dispose of the one instrument which is presently equipped to discover errors, waste, incompetence, and dishonesty in connection with the hundreds of billions of dollars we have spent in the war effort.

Certain powers and privileges granted to this committee are extremely important and a background of knowledge of the whole picture is likewise extremely important to any committee of Congress charged with the responsibility of investigating war profits. Without those powers and privileges, the job of investigating the war profits would be much more difficult and the chances of discovering frauds or abuses would be more remote. We, here in the Senate, can attribute the desire to abolish this committee to the streamlining of Congress, the Reorganization Act, but the people of this country, I fear, will not interpret the desire to destroy the committee as anything other than the desire to keep from the people the truth in regard to the way in which their money has been spent.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think a statement ought to be made now, in view of the Senator's interpretation of what he fears may be public sentiment in regard to what we are seeking here. He admits that we are in good faith in our opposition to this proposal on account of the streamlining of Congress under the reorganization bill, but that the public may get a different view of it. That is probably true because of the fact that over the radio certain commentators are charging to this side of the Senate some ulterior motive in that regard, and in one of the regular columns of the newspapers an intimation of that sort has been made. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] a moment ago I think, undoubtedly by some insinuation, left the impression that there might be some reason why someone on this side would oppose any investigation at all. If that is what he had in mind, I wish to call attention to the fact that during the entire progress of the war, when we were in the majority and not in the minority, we proposed every investigation which has been carried on. The original resolution, No. 71, was offered by the then Senator from Missouri, now the President of the United States. It was amended seven or eight times afterward on the motion of Senators on this side who were then of the majority.

All the investigations which have been had, looking into war expenditures or the conduct of the war, or the beginning of the war, or anything connected with it, have been sponsored by Members on this side of the aisle, who were of the majority, and who felt a responsibility for what had been done.

Mr. President, because now we are taking the position that with the reorganization of Congress, we should concentrate in the standing committees all the work that has heretofore been done by special committees, and because we have undertaken to define clearly their jurisdiction, it seems to me it is unjust, unfair, and without foundation even to insinuate or to express the fear that the people may conclude we are not actuated by any worthy motive, but are actuated only by a desire to stop or interfere with an investigation.

I want to say, for myself, and so far as I can speak for this side of the aisle—I cannot undertake to speak for Senators on the other side of the aisle, even though some of them may agree with my position on this particular proposal—that there is now no desire on the part of any Senators in the minority, who have been recently in the majority and have sponsored these investigations, to stop them, to interfere with them, to conceal anything that is valuable to the Congress in enacting legislation, or that is valuable to the American people in determining the merits of service in the Houses of Congress or in the executive branch of the Government.

I hope that we may proceed with this discussion without insinuations of any sort, hinted or otherwise.

I am not charging, and I have not heard of anybody on this side who has charged that this resolution is being sponsored on account of politics or some desire to obtain political advantage, and I think it is equally fair to say that nobody who is opposing it is doing so out of any ulterior motive or out of any fear of anything that may be disclosed by reason of the investigation. Certainly I desire to have brought out every pertinent fact to which the American people are entitled, and to which Congress is entitled, in order to frame appropriate legislation.

I am not now arguing the merits of the resolution—I shall do so a little later—but I wish to say, while I have the floor, that at the beginning of this Congress, when we are starting out to make a record in line with what I have felt was the spirit and the intent of the Reorganization Act, it is proposed to start off on a course of action which will rise up to plague us in the future when we are undertaking to funnel into the standing committees which we have established, and whose jurisdiction we have defined, all the work that ought to be done by Congress, either as a basis for legislation or for the purpose of giving information to the American people.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me for the purpose of making that interjection.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I wish to reply briefly to what the Senator from Kentucky has said. If anything which I said intimated any impropriety of motive, I certainly apologize, but I will suggest to the distingushed majority leader that the first two blows below the belt——

Mr. BARKLEY. Just a moment. I thank the Senator for the designation he has just given me. It is as hard for him to become accustomed to my position as it is to me.

Mr. BREWSTER. It will take some time to become accustomed to it. I wish to say to the distinguished minority leader that the first two blows below the belt came from the other side of the aisle, from none other than the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], both of whom intimated what I think was rather clearly impropriety in the motives which were actuating Senators on this side. But I suppose those are matters incidental perhaps to the heat of conflict, and I am sure the Senator from Kentucky will continue to exercise his very excellent control on both sides of the aisle to keep this matter under Marquis of Queensbury rules.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator, and I shall invite his cooperation in that respect.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho, and then I shall refuse to yield further until I have finished, at which time I shall be glad to invite all questions Senators may desire to ask.

Mr. TAYLOR. I should like to clarify the discussion a little by asking a question of the Senator from Michigan. A moment ago he said the public might receive the wrong impression if the Senate were to vote to abolish the special committee in question. The vote is not to abolish the committee, as I understand; the vote is to reconstitute it and give it some of the functions of a standing committee. Is that really not what the vote to be taken by the Senate will be?

Mr. FERGUSON. The vote will be taken on the proposal for continuation of the committee. The committee will be abolished automatically on the 31st day of this month if the Senate does not vote to continue it. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. President, I think the remarks made by the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] with respect to what the public might think should be answered in this way: I read from a column by David Lawrence. The column is headed "Congress move seen to bar investigations—New Dealers look for way out under Reorganization Act."

The column appeared in the Washington Star of last evening. The article in part is as follows:

> It begins to look as if the New Dealers who spent billions of dollars of public money without an audit of their expenditures and as if the bureaucrats who abused public power are about to escape scrutiny, and perhaps punishment altogether, by the device of banning special congressional investigating committees.
> The Republicans will prove themselves poor politicians and will virtually hand over the 1948 election to the Democrats if they go along with the let-bygones-be-bygones spirit which is behind the effort to kill off investigating committees.
> The Republican Party won in 1946 because the public at last saw through a decade of New Deal propaganda and finally got the impact of governmental controls operating at their worst. But the true extent of governmental mismanagement has never been disclosed to the public. It had been believed that in the next 2 years there would be an opportunity to turn the searchlight of publicity on the misdeeds of the last decade.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the article in full published in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS MOVE SEEN TO BAR INVESTIGATIONS—NEW DEALERS LOOK FOR WAY OUT UNDER REORGANIZATION ACT

(By David Lawrence)

It begins to look as if the New Dealers who spent billions of dollars of public money without an audit of their expenditures and as if the bureaucrats who abused public power are about to escape scrutiny, and perhaps punishment altogether, by the device of banning special congressional investigating committees.

The Republicans will prove themselves poor politicians and will virtually hand over the 1948 election to the Democrats if they go along with the let-bygones-be-bygones spirit which is behind the effort to kill off investigating committees.

The Republican Party won in 1946 because the public at last saw through a decade of New Deal propaganda and finally got the impact of governmental controls operating at their worst. But the true extent of governmental mismanagement has never been disclosed to the public. It had been believed that in the next 2 years there would be an opportunity to turn the searchlight of publicity on the misdeeds of the last decade.

Now, however, the Democrats see a chance to squelch investigating committees by arguing that the Congressional Reorganization Act was designed to do away with special committees. It is being contended that the regular committees of the Senate, for instance, can do the investigating. This is a fallacy, for the regular committees are much too busy with their regular assignments to do all the investigating necessary to penetrate a complicated field of inquiry, which is usually the reason for a special Senate resolution ordering a special committee to take testimony.

PRECEDENT IS SOUGHT

The issue arises, to be sure, over the continuance of the Truman-Mead committee, but it goes far deeper. For the Senate is being asked to establish a precedent and let all committee investigating be done by regular committees.

The Congressional Reorganization Act will become a mockery if it is constantly interpreted as a device to curtail the rights of the Congress itself. There is nothing sacrosanct about a reorganization bill which is invoked every day as a reason for not doing what the Congress is supposed to do—namely, to protect the people's interests against abuse.

The same persons in Congress—with an exception here and there on both sides of the aisle—who are inveighing against special committees took a sadistic delight in using committee investigation powers to harass their political opponents. Even the income-tax returns of citizens which were supposed to be secret were tossed before investigating committees by the New Deal administration in its ideological combat that precipitated the present wave of class warfare in America.

It is true that some investigating committees go too far but on the whole they do more good than harm. It is true also that some of the regular committees have succeeded in squelching inquiries and that the only way the House of Representatives, for example, got a chance to investigate the labor situation under the watchful eye of Representative HOWARD SMITH, Democrat, of Virginia, a few years ago was to appoint a special committee. The regular Labor Committee of the House was stacked by the prolabor elements in this country against an inquiry.

It will be easy for the lobbyists to get to some of the regular committee and stack the membership in the future, as in the past, by concentrating against the one or two members who hold the balance of power. When Congress, however, is free to look into any subject at any time with a special committee, the lobbyists have everything to fear and so have the individuals who abuse the power of Government.

While the Congressional Reorganization Act is a good thing, it was intended to assist routine procedures and not to rule in advance on substantive matters of legislative interest. If the barrier of the law is to be brought forward every time some of the Members of Congress want to make an inquiry, it will gradually weaken the act itself and bring about repeal. Certainly, as between a curtailment of the power of Congress to investigate and the so-called streamlining of routine procedures, it would be better to give the benefit of the doubt to the investigating process, which is the sole instrument that really scares many bureaucrats from committing abuses.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have the greatest respect for Mr. David Lawrence. I realize the fact that over the years he has been a consistent opponent of some of the things he calls New Dealism. But it seems that in his article he is assuming to advise the Republicans they ought not to throw away the election in 1948 by accepting the theory that bygones should be bygones. No one is advocating that. No one desires that. There is no basis whatever for the assumption or the insinuation that because some of us here are seeking to stand by what we have done in the reorganization of the Congress, we are actuated by some fear, or by some motive, that is not up to the highest standards of what ought to actuate us here in the Congress of the United States. I have expressed over and over again, and I reiterate now, the hope that Congress during the next 2 years will not spend its time trying to maneuver for position in order that somebody may be elected or that somebody may be defeated for President of the United States in 1948. I do not know of anything in the present status of American opinion and American attitude, as well as that of the world, that would be more deplorable or in my judgment more against the interest and the welfare and the opinion of the American people than to see both parties or either party spend 2 years trying to maneuver itself into position so that it would have some advantage in the next Presidential election. I hope that neither side in this Chamber can truthfully be accused of any such waste of the legislative time and any such misconception of the verdict of the American people, either for or against an political party. That is my own individual opinion about the matter, and I think it is shared by very great numbers of Members of this Chamber and of the American people.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I am glad to have yielded to the Senator from Kentucky in order that he might make an explanation, because I feel that the public is entitled to the explanation. I am glad that what I had to say on the Senate floor has caused debate upon this important question, for I sincerely feel that if the special committee in question is discontinued the work it has hitherto begun will be delayed, and delay, as we all know, in many cases is a denial of justice.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me again? I am sorry to continue to interrupt the Senator's speech.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wanted to state, in order that it may not be regarded as a partisan matter, that while we were in the majority, and while we were expecting still to continue to be in the majority, I may say——

Mr. FERGUSON. I appreciate that.

Mr. BARKLEY. We had already decided not to continue these special committees. At the last session, in order that they might wind up their work, in order that they might have a month of this session to do what they had been unable to do, so that they might complete their work and make their final reports, we extended them until the 31st day of January. So, the fact that the political complexion of the Senate changed as the result of the election has not had any effect on our attitude, because following the enactment of the Reorganization Act we occupied the same position that we occupy now. As I recall, in the debate here during the consideration of that measure, there was no serious disagreement among us as to the desirability and advisability and the wisdom of stopping the creation of special committees.

As we all know, when the House amended the measure, and it came back here, the then Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. La Follette, was, as I said the other day, facing the point of a gun. We were about to adjourn the Congress. There was no time for an extended conference to work out the differences between the two Houses. The Senator from Wisconsin explained that situation on the floor, and stated it was necessary to yield to the amendments of the House in order to get any legislation at all, because Congress was going to adjourn soon. I think it had already agreed on a date practically upon which it would adjourn, and that had a great deal to do with the yielding of the Senate to the House amendments which have been discussed heretofore. Be that as it may, we were compelled to act hastily in order to get any legislation at all; and most of us felt that if we did not get the bill through at that session it might be a long time before we could ever get it considered again, if ever.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. From what the able and distinguished minority leader has just said, I take it that there was not really very much justification for the complaint by the able Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] the other day on the question of the two resolutions being reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration without, as he put it, adequate hearing for the minority members. As I understood the able Senator from Kentucky, the Democratic Members of the Senate had made a unilateral determination of policy not to continue these committees, even before the country had spoken as to who should control the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not inconsistent with the remarks of the Senator from Arizona. He was complaining that, according to his judgment, this matter was rushed through the Committee on Rules and Administration without any opportunity for hearing. I do not know what happened in the Committee on Rules and Administration. I am not a member of that committee. I see nothing inconsistent between the statement made by the Senator from Arizona, insisting that opportunity be given in the Rules Committee for hearing, and the statement that I made that we had all practically agreed, without any formal understanding among those of us who discussed it on both sides of the aisle, that special committees should not be continued.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I am sure the distinguished minority leader does not intend to imply that the conclusion of what was then a rapidly disappearing majority should bind the Members of this body. We have had an influx of new blood. There are 17 new Members on this side of the aisle.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand.

Mr. BREWSTER. I am sure that it would be most ungracious to suggest that the conclusions of the disappearing majority should bind new Senators who have come fresh from the grass roots.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Maine is too clever to assume that I meant any such thing. What I was undertaking to do was to convince even the Senator from Maine, who is sometimes stubborn and hard to convince from my viewpoint, that our attitude on this resolution is not something that has suddenly arisen because we find ourselves in the minority. That was our attitude all along, after we passed the Reorganization Act and during its consideration.

I may say on that point, while I am on my feet, that from time to time while we were in the majority and were creating special committees on motion, or as a result of resolutions sponsored by Members on this side of the aisle, many Members of what was then the minority, including the distinguished and able minority leader, the late Senator McNary, of Oregon, who preceded the very able present majority leader, the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], frequently complained because, as he said, special committees were going to seed and were absorbing and usurping the power and jurisdiction of standing committees. He stated that, so far as he was concerned, he was ready to cooperate in an effort to stop the practice. That was before Congress was reorganized.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I suggest that we should observe the Biblical injunction to "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth," because it was a special committee which accomplished the reorganization to which the Senator from Kentucky now pays such profound tribute. If that special committee had not been created, we never would have had the reorganization for which we are all so grateful.

Mr. BARKLEY. That was a joint committee and not the sort of committee which we are now considering.

I appreciate the Senator's reference to the Biblical injunction, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth," because the Senator from Maine and I are both young enough to remember our creators at our present ages. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, it appears from what has been said by the able minority leader that the minority—last year the majority—had decided that the war investigation should cease so far as any special committee was concerned, and that any investigation in the future should be made by the standing committees.

There has been a great deal of discussion in this debate which seems to be based upon the proposition that special investigating committees are prohibited by the spirit of the Reorganization Act. I submit that there is not a sentence in the act itself which would justify us in saying that there is any spirit of the act which would prevent special committees. If we were to say that, we would say that a bill or joint resolution passed by one branch of Congress should be the law. I find no reason for any Senator saying that if a law is enacted during the closing days of a session it should be given a different interpretation from that which would attach to it if it were passed on the tenth day of the session. I have never heard anyone argue to a court that because a law was enacted near the close of a session, therefore the people should not regard it as the law.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I decline to yield, because I wish to finish what I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. It is true that the reorganization bill, as it first passed the Senate, contained such a prohibition. I have before me the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 10, 1946, which shows that the vote was as follows: Yeas, 49; nays, 16; not voting, 31.

At that particular time I was in Bermuda performing certain duties in connection with a legislative committee, and I did not vote. Today we are told that the 17 new Members on this side of the aisle, 31 Members who did not vote at that time, and 16 Members who voted "nay," should have nothing to say about special committees in the future. Can anyone imagine the Senate adopting a rule similar to the rule with respect to unlimited debate, that nothing can be done in relation to a special committee unless by a two-thirds vote? I say that if we ever adopt such a rule, it will mean that one party will be allowed to control the United States Senate. However, in the view of Senator La Follette, even this prohibition could have been overcome by a two-thirds vote, which he believed would be done in an important matter not clearly within the jurisdiction of any standing committee.

Whatever the situation may have been under the Senate version of the bill as it originally passed, that situation does not exist today. The House deleted section 126 entirely, and the Senate accepted the position taken by the House. Thus Congress clearly and expressly rejected the proposition that special investigating committees be abolished.

If the House of Representatives had accepted the Senate version of the bill, it would have been impossible to appoint a special committee on the occasion of the President's appearance at the joint meeting of the two Houses. Nothing could have been done with relation to special committees if the House had adopted the version which it now appears should not have been adopted.

How, then, can it be argued that the spirit of the Reorganization Act will be violated by the continuation of the Special Senate Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program? Not only is there no language in the act justifying this proposition, but the proposition was advanced and expressly rejected, leaving no doubt that it was the intent and will of Congress that it be free to continue its practice of creating special committees to explore specific subjects.

We have other special committees. We have the Atomic Energy Committee. We have the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation; and from time to time I know that there will be occasions when special committees will be essential to the welfare of this great Nation.

As to jurisdiction, it has been suggested that the work of the Truman-Mead committee can be handled by the Armed Services Committee. This, it seems to me, overlooks the fact that it was not the Army and Navy alone which expended money for national defense in the last war, which was a total war. A review of the committee's work will reveal that its inquiries went far beyond the scope of the activities of the War and Navy Departments alone. A great deal of its work was concerned with the special war agencies and the relationship between them. In fact, some of the committee's most valuable work was in calling attention to overlapping and duplication between various war agencies and conflicts in certain war programs. A committee limited in scope to one agency, whatever it might have done internally within that agency, would have been handicapped in doing what the Truman-Mead committee was able to do.

It should also be remembered that most of these war agencies did not owe their existence to specific legislation but were created by Executive order under the war powers delegated by Congress to the President.

I think it would be helpful in considering the question of jurisdiction to name the various war agencies and departments from which the committee obtained information during its 6 years of existence. I ask the Senate what standing committees today would investigate the following-named agencies which do not come under the War and Navy Departments. They were creatures of the Executive department alone. These are the agencies:

Reconstruction Finance Corporation.
Defense Plant Corporation.
Rubber Development Corporation.
Metals Reserve Company.
Smaller War Plants Corporation.
Office of War Information.
United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.
Office of Defense Transportation.
State Department.
Foreign Liquidation Commissioner.
Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs.

Mr. President, when the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program was investigating the Inter-American Highway in Central America, to my amazement we discovered that the Office of Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs spent a million dollars of the taxpayers' money to build a road around the edge of a lake in Honduras.

Is there any need for an investigation other than of the War Department?

When this committee was in Trinidad investigating, it found that the Navy Department had built, at a cost of half a million dollars, a highway 7 miles long, over a mountain which was 1,850 feet high.

When we were in Bermuda we found that the War Department, or some other department of our Government, had resurfaced all the roads of Bermuda.

Is it not time that there be some accounting for what was done?

Let me add that the use of automobiles is now permitted in Bermuda. Formerly Bermuda was in the "horse and buggy" age. Now automobiles are used. I saw nothing but small black cars of about 10 horsepower operating upon the highways. To my amazement, I discovered that a law had been passed in Bermuda prohibiting the use of automobiles with a greater horsepower than 10. Therefore, the United States, not manufacturing that kind of car, cannot ship any automobiles to Bermuda.

Do I see any reason why we should make investigations?

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator mean to imply that the United States, through the Army or other agency, has built automobile roads throughout the entire Bermuda Islands?

Mr. FERGUSON. They have resurfaced the roads.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are several islands in the group, and I am wondering whether the Senator means that the United States Government resurfaced all roads in Bermuda, or only in that portion of the islands where we had our bases.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am unable to tell the full extent. I saw a great number of roads which had been resurfaced.

Mr. BARKLEY. The difference would be quite important, because it is my understanding that only such resurfacing was done as was necessary to carry out the purposes involved in the construction and utilization of the base or bases which we had in Bermuda, and not all the roads in the entire Bermuda group.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky if he knows anything about the highway that was built over the mountains in Trinidad.

Mr. BARKLEY. I know nothing whatever about it.

Mr. FERGUSON. The reason given to us was that it was desired to have a bathing beach constructed for the Navy in Port-of-Spain.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not interrupt the Senator to discuss Trinidad, because I know nothing about it. While I am on the subject of Bermuda, the information I have is that an improved road was built to connect the bases at either end of one of the islands on which we obtained bases, and that such work was not done at any other point.

Mr. FERGUSON. It is my understanding that more than a connecting road is involved. Roads not connecting with our bases are paved.

Continuing with the list of war agencies, we find the following:

Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs.
Foreign Economic Administration.
Office of Lend-Lease Administration.

I shall have something to say later about that agency.

Treasury Procurement Division.
Export-Import Bank of Washington.
Agriculture Department.
War Food Administration.
Interior Department.
Petroleum Administration for War.
Federal Works Agency.
National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.
National Inventors Council.
Maritime Commission.
War Shipping Administration.
National Housing Agency.
War Assets Administration.
Office of Production Management.
War Production Board.
Office of Price Administration.
War Manpower Commission.
Labor Department.
War Labor Board.
Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion.
Civilian Production Administration.
Office of International Trade.
Veterans' Administration.
Federal Communications Commission.
Office of Alien Property Custodian.

The titles of the reports of the committee also clearly disclose that the work of the War and Navy Departments, although important, was only a part of the subject matter explored by the committee. These reports conclusively show that they do not deal exclusively with the War and Navy Departments. Nor did the expenditures relate to only those departments.

I ask that the list of titles of reports be printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, the Armed Services Committee will have to consider some far-reaching legislative matters concerning present and future national defense, such as the size of the armed forces, universal military training, unification and organization of the armed forces, and numerous other important subjects. Obtaining the facts necessary to make wise decisions on these current and pressing matters will tax the members and staff of that committee. How much time will that committee have left over to explore expenditures in World War II? It will have very little time during the Eightieth Congress in which to do the job now before it, the great job of legislating and providing for our future defense by the armed services.

The real question before the Senate is whether the Senate and the people want to know any more about how their agents discharged their public trust in the handling of the vast powers and in the expenditure of hundreds of billions of dollars in the most gigantic enterprise in the country's history or in the history of the world.

If there are more Canol projects, do we want it known, or do we want it to remain forever buried? Do we want to know the truth, or do we want it suppressed?

I would like to ask how many Senators present ever heard of the alleged war project known as the Rama Road before last August. I never had. I learned about this project almost by accident, when I was down in Nicaragua investigating the Inter-American Highway. The Rama Road is not a link of the Inter-American Highway, but $4,000,000 were allocated to its construction out of the secret fund appropriated to the President by the Congress for war purposes. I say the construction of the Rama Road had nothing to do with winning the war. It has no tangible nor sound connection with the prosecution of the war. However, it has been suggested that the United States will now be required to put up $2,500,000 more to fulfill President Roosevelt's secret agreement with President Somosa of Nicaragua concerning the Rama Road.

In order to advise the Senate just what the country is faced with in this regard, I quote from the public hearing held by the committee on the investigation of the Inter-American Highway on Saturday, September 28, 1946, with respect to the completion of the Rama Road:

Senator FERGUSON. Is it your contention that this country is bound, by a signed obligation, to build this highway, no matter what it costs, to Rama, on the basis of making it equal to the Inter-American Highway?

Mr. Cabot, of the State Department, said:

It is not bound to make it equal to the Inter-American Highway, but we are bound, by the exchange of notes, to build the highway. In other words, it would be extremely embarrassing to go to the Nicaraguans and say we could not build the road.

Senator FERGUSON. No matter what it costs?

Mr. CABOT. It was on the basis of our own estimates.

Mr. Meader, counsel for the committee, asked this question:

Are we obligated to build the highway or simply to pay the $4,000,000?

Mr. CABOT. I would say to build the highway.

Mr. MEADER. In your opinion, the obligation is to build a road from San Benito to Rama, not to give them $4,000,000?

Mr. CABOT. No; it was to build the road.

Mr. MEADER. Do you think it is an obligation of this Government to spend the additional $2,500,000 over Mr. James' estimate?

Mr. CABOT. As I remember the notes, I think it would be an obligation of this Government to build a road from San Benito to Rama.

Mr. President, the construction of the Rama Road in Nicaragua is only one instance of the use of the President's emergency fund for national defense which has come to my attention.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Does the Senator from Michigan consider that the various matters which he has just mentioned come within the purview of section (b), with respect to the Committee on Expenditures in the Government Departments, which provides for jurisdiction in connection with studying the cooperation of Government activities at all levels with a view to determining their economy and efficiency? Is it the Senator's opinion that this committee could do the work about which he has been talking?

Mr. FERGUSON. I construe that language to mean that if the committee were adequately staffed and if it had the knowledge which is presently had by the investigating committee, which was acquired as the result of the expenditure of some $300,000, it could do the work.

Mr. McMAHON. If the Senator from Michigan with a majority of the Senate would vote to turn over to the standing committee the files and staff of the investigating committee, the standing committee could carry on that activity, as charged under the law, could it not?

Mr. FERGUSON. I do not believe so. I believe that if we wish to have the job done well, the work should be handled under the present set-up.

Mr. McMAHON. Is it the contention of the Senator from Michigan that the Senators who would be on the special committee would have greater talent than the Senators who have been named from both sides of the aisle to serve on the standing committee which I have mentioned?

Mr. FERGUSON. Not at all. The Senators on the special committee merely have experience and knowledge which has been acquired from the special committee's work.

The question now before us—and we are facing it squarely—is whether we are willing to cast aside all that experience and all that knowledge, whether we are willing to throw it to the winds, and then start all over again.

Mr. President, now that the war is over, it seems to me that a great deal of the expenditure out of this tremendous fund, for which no detailed accounting was required during the war, should be explored and made known to the people, because the veil of secrecy has been removed, for the President has declared that hostilities have ended. How many more expenditures, similar to the Rama Road, were made out of this emergency war fund? I think the Senate of the United States and the people of the country are entitled to know.

There has also come to the committee's attention other expenditures of which the people generally know nothing, and which, I dare say, very few Members of Congress know about. One of these is the expenditure of nearly half a million dollars, as I previously mentioned, on other highways. This was done without any express appropriation from the Congress for that purpose, and without advising the Congress of the expenditure.

One matter before the committee which does not involve either the War or Navy Department is the procurement of items for lend-lease by the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department. The committee has in its files, but has not explored in public hearings, instances of inordinate profits made by individuals out of sales of small hardware items to Treasury Procurement for lend-lease to our allies in the war. I wish to mention just one instance out of several which the committee has investigated. I shall do so without naming the company involved, because I believe that would be unfair, until the committee has determined to conduct a full public hearing. This item is a small steel pin, approximately 3 inches long. I have one of those pins in my hand, and I now hold it up for inspection. This pin has not been milled smoothly. It would seem to be made of wrought iron, or perhaps it is a rough steel pin, judging by its appearance.

Sixty-seven thousand of these pins were bought by Treasury Procurement from a firm which had no manufacturing facilities whatever. That firm, in turn, sublet the entire production of the pin to another firm. The firm which actually manufactured the pin received 3 cents for each pin, but the Government paid to the firm with which it had its contract 34 cents for each pin. In this case the middleman's profit, which the Government paid, was 955 percent over the manufacturer's price. Mr. President, do we need an accounting, or do we not need an accounting?

There are other, similar instances of procurement by the Treasury Department for lend-lease where contractors having no manufacturing facilities were paid prices 50 to 1,000 percent higher than the manufacturer's price. These matters do not affect the field of foreign affairs, but they relate to contracts, solely domestic matters, made by the Treasury's Procurement Division. In the cases examined by the committee, doing business in this fashion has cost the Government $2,000,000 over the manufacturer's actual price.

Mr. President, is it time that the Senate looked into the favoritism shown to certain manufacturers? Why should the Government, during its greatest emergency, when it was fighting for its very life, pay 34 cents for a pin which cost 3 cents to manufacture, and thus pay a profit of 955 percent? I wish to raise my voice today in behalf of this investigation. I wish to talk to those who desire to have proof that this special committee is needed. That is why I stand here as a member of the committee, because I feel it is my solemn duty, knowing what I do from the files and from the work I have done on the committee, to urge each and every Senator that the work be continued by the special committee and that the public be given an accounting of the expenditure of these billions of dollars.

Mr. President, in a democracy I think the people are entitled to the full and true facts about the public business so that they may judge for themselves. When we take the position that it is none of the peoples' business how their money is spent we approach the kind of governmental authority which Hitler enjoyed. It was always my view that we fought the war for the precise purpose of saving the form of government in which the people could know the facts, and in the light of those facts make the ultimate decisions.

I know there is not a single Member of the Senate who wants to keep the people from knowing how their money has been spent in the war. There is not a single Senator who has the remotest desire to protect dishonesty, extravagance, and unfaithfulness to the public trust. But will the people understand? We all know that the vast expenditures in this war have not been fully explored. Under these circumstances, can the destruction of the Truman-Mead committee be interpreted as anything other than an attempt to stifle and suppress the truth regarding war expenditures?

I do not believe we can convince the public that we are destroying the Truman-Mead committee in the interest of progress.

I sincerely hope the vote on this resolution will not be a party-line vote, though the indications today are that it will be. Such a vote is certain to be understood by the people—and I am sure the American people will remember this vote.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I wish to speak very briefly to the question now before the Senate, and to associate myself completely with the very splendid exposition of the work of the committee by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], who has preceded me. So I shall not labor the issues which he has placed in their historical sequence. I should merely like to clear certain misconceptions which it seems to me have been rather pressed in questions at certain times, as to why it is felt that the existing investigating committee has any special qualifications for its task.

I do not know whether a sporting analogy would hold, that we have a team which has been functioning for 4 years, composed of Members of the Senate, six of whom have survived the recent elections and are still continuing members of the committee, and the staff of the committee, who have been with us in some instances from the beginning, and in other instances for a very considerable period, and have developed a comprehension of the problems and an understanding of the methods of approach which it seems to me would take some time to duplicate with other Members of the Senate or of the staff.

Second, as to the reorganization of Congress, I realize the force of the arguments which have been made. I have been one of those who strongly supported the reorganization. I would point out, however, that in the first place the proposed statutory limitation upon the creation of special committees was struck out before the action on the bill was completed, so that there is no inhibition of that character. Certainly, the creation of special committees has proved very salutary in the past, as illustrated by the Special Joint Committee on Reorganization, as the minority leader has pointed out, which accomplished this herculean task.

Third, in the instance of the special investigating committee, while technically the resolution was not referred to the Committee on Armed Services, the standing committee having jurisdiction of much of the material, it has been a matter of intimate discussion, and understandings have been reached with the majority of the committee, with the full knowledge of the minority, which indicates that jurisdictional problems would be reduced to a minimum, and it was the feeling, as I understand, of at least a majority of the Committee on Armed Services, that not only would the continuation of the special committee not encroach upon the jurisdiction which they contemplated exercising, but that they would welcome the completion of the great work in which this committee has been engaged, by its carrying on to conclusion the investigation of irregularities incident to war procurement, and by completing this with a rounded-out report covering the whole problem of procurement in time of war, which, with the thousands of pages of evidence we have accumulated, can well furnish the material upon which any constructive future legislation may be based.

It is for these reasons that it is my hope that the Senate will conclude that it will be wise to continue the special committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] to strike out lines 12 and 13, and to insert in lieu thereof certain words.

Mr. LUCAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

THE ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces that nominations have been received for the members of the Atomic Energy Commission and the general manager of the Atomic Energy Commission. It is the purpose of the Chair to refer these nominations to the Senate section of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy as soon as it is reorganized. These nominations will be held on the desk of the President pro tempore until we can complete the reorganization of the Senate section of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to be absent on Friday of this week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted.

REPRINT OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT (S. DOC. 248)

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I particularly invite the attention of the distinguished Senator from Maine, the majority leader, to the fact that in the Seventy-ninth Congress a bill was passed and signed by the President, and it is now the law, known as the Administrative Procedure Act.

At that time, pursuant to an order of this body, there was printed a complete résumé of the entire act, with its history, and significant expressions coming from the hearings. Ten thousand copies were printed. The demand coming from the public, and especially from the bar of America, was so great, at 50 cents a copy, that there now remain but about 60 copies, although none of the Senators have received a copy, and no Member of the House has received a copy.

It is the desire of the American bar and the American people generally that additional copies be printed. These copies are purchased by the public at 50 cents a copy, but a number of them should be available for the Members of the Senate, that they in turn might distribute them to their constituents.

I ask unanimous consent at this time that there may be a reprint of the publication to the extent of 2,500 copies, so that a copy may be furnished to every Member of Congress, and so that the public may obtain copies upon the payment of 50 cents a copy, as they have been required to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

DISPOSITION OF BIG INCH AND LITTLE INCH PIPE LINES

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution dealing with the disposition of the Big Inch and Little Inch pipe lines; and I should like to address myself briefly to the joint resolution.

This measure would prevent the sale of these two transcontinental pipe lines by the War Assets Administration for a reasonable period—the resolution provides 6 months—after the submission to Congress of a final report by the Federal Power Commission on its current investigation of the natural-gas industry and its recommendations for the development of a national natural gas policy. The pipe lines figured largely in their studies of natural gas.

The reason for my action at this time, Mr. President, is that the War Assets Administration is once again asking for bids for these pipe lines, and has indicated it will give natural gas equal priority with petroleum products in considering sales awards. This is an about face by War Assets to its previous position, which was that bidders proposing to use the pipe lines for the transportation of petroleum products would be given greater consideration than those proposing to use the lines for the transportation of natural gas. The decision was reached, I am afraid, as a result of the excitement and near hysteria which accompanied the last work stoppage in the bituminous coal mines. Strident demands were made at that time that the pipe lines be converted to natural gas in order, so the proponents maintained, to help alleviate the coal shortage. Hearings before a special committee of the other House, the House Surplus Property Investigating Committee, featured much testimony and a great deal of opinion regarding the merits of this proposal. Soon thereafter the War Assets Administrator prepared a report, which was submitted to Congress January 3, 1947, providing for the sale of the pipe lines to the highest bidders regardless of usage those bidders intended to make of the facilities.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. I shall be happy to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator identify the pipe line about which he is speaking? I think I know, but I think the record ought to be made clear, if that has not been done.

Mr. MYERS. I indicated at the begining of my remarks that the resolution deals with the Big Inch and the Little Inch pipe lines.

Mr. LUCAS. I regret I was not present at the time.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I am very much interested in the remarks made by the able Senator from Pennsylvania upon the subject on which he is speaking, because the report first made by the War Assets Administration ordered both the Big Inch and the Little Inch pipe lines to be sold for the transportation of oil, as has been stated here by the Senator, while a new report was filed on January 1 which provides that the lines might be sold for any purpose of transportation.

Mr. President, under the law dealing with the disposition of surplus property that report becomes law unless Congress changes it or refuses to accept or adopt it. I may say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and I introduced a joint resolution which is now pending before the Committee on Armed Services, asking an extension of 90 days within which Congress may consider the new report.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I know of the joint resolution which the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Wyoming have introduced, and I am entirely in accord with the purpose and the spirit of the measure. However, I believe that Congress should have probably more than 90 days within which to consider the matter, and that we should have the report from the Federal Power Commission before any action is taken on the disposition of the two pipe lines.

Under the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended, the Congress presently has only until February 3, 1947, as the able Senator from West Virginia has said, to act on this recommendation and if it takes no action by that date the Administrator can then carry out the proposal he has made.

To my mind, it will be impossible for the appropriate committees to give this proposal the study it requires in the limited period yet remaining before this February 3 deadline. This is a very serious matter. This is a matter which affects the future economy of one of the largest single economic areas in my State. It is a matter which threatens one of our greatest industries.

If these pipe lines are sold for the purpose of bringing natural gas to the eastern seaboard, it is not merely likely, but probable, that the anthracite mining industry will have been dealt a blow which could conceivably wipe it out. We would have a situation which the Federal Government as a wartime measure expended millions of dollars and great energy constructing facilities designed mainly and primarily to help win the war, and then turned these facilities, constructed under those unusual circumstances, over to one industry in order to help it wipe out another industry. To me this is unthinkable. I know that there is a reasonable doubt in the minds of many that the flow of natural gas through these pipe lines to the eastern seaboard would actually put a very sizable dent into the markets of the hard-coal industry. These persons might reasonably point to the fact that the volume of natural gas which would flow through these pipes would be only a small percentage of the heating needs of the area to which this gas would be directed. That is correct. However, I want to point out that this percentage of the market which would be diverted away from the hard-coal industry—about 10 percent—is substantial enough to represent the difference between profit and loss in the anthracite industry. Our export market for United States products generally is only about 10 percent of our total market, yet all of us recognize the fact that 10 percent in many industries is the difference between breaking even and making money or losing money. The same holds true for anthracite coal. We need the market we now have in order for anthracite to remain a healthy industry. The Government of the United States and the people of the United States have an important stake in the health of that industry. We needed it badly in war. We will always need it in peace. We must see to it that it remains a healthy industry so that it can function.

The Congress last year appropriated $450,000 of the taxpayers' money to help carry out the Government's obligations to see that this industry remains healthy. That money is earmarked for the construction of a scientific laboratory in the anthracite region designed to find new uses for anthracite coal, to develop more efficient methods of mining it, and to promote more convenient use of the fuel. Now to destroy that industry by Government favor to a competing industry would make our proposed new laboratory useless.

I want to address myself for a few moments to the factors behind the apparent desire of many persons to see natural gas introduced through these Government-constructed pipe lines to the east coast. The most familiar reason which has been cited is that these pipe lines would help to break what these persons say is the grip of John L. Lewis over the economy of the Nation.

This is a fallacious argument. It is altogether unrealistic and substitutes emotion and hysteria for reason and fact. The anthracite industry is only a very small segment of the entire coal industry in the United States. Uses for anthracite are restricted now almost entirely to domestic heating. When the last coal walk-out occurred—and mark this, Mr. President, this walk-out was largely restricted to the bituminous coal industry—the pipe lines were put forward by many articulate sources as one answer to the industrial crisis presented by the coal shortage. Yet the natural gas these lines could carry to the East would have little or no effect on industrial fuel requirements but would largely go into the same channels which anthracite coal now serves—private houses and other heating plants. There was no crisis in anthracite supply.

Another thing, the anthracite industry which would be affected so drastically by Government-aided natural gas competition is not at present in Government hands, as is the rest of the coal-mining industry in the United States. It is under private management and ownership and control. It is free enterprise. It is enlightened free enterprise. Anthracite mine owners were able, where bituminous owners were not, to reach agreement with the United Mine Workers Union last year on a wage and working-condition contract which is outstanding in the history of the private—as against Government-operated—mining industry.

In order to punish John L. Lewis and his United Mine Workers, for that seems to be the philosophy largely behind the effort to introduce natural gas through the pipe lines to the east coast, some articulate groups in this country would disrupt and perhaps ruin a Pennsylvania industry providing the livelihood of nearly 2,000,000 Pennsylvanians, but there would be little if any sizable effect on the rest of the mining industry or on the Lewis union.

Anthracite production, practically all of it in Pennsylvania, in 1946 totaled about 60,500,000 tons, an increase of more than 10 percent over the 1945 total, according to production figures released yesterday by the Solid Fuels Administration. Nineteen hundred and forty-five production was likewise high. The anthracite mines of Pennsylvania helped to keep the eastern seaboard warm throughout the war when users of oil and other fuels in the east were shivering. Members of this body, who lived in homes or apartments heated by hard coal, can thank the anthracite miners of my State for being warm and comfortable here in Washington during the war.

All I ask today is that the Senate—with the House, I hope, concurring—agree to give this industry a fair chance to defend its life. The Federal Power Commission has been making a thorough investigation of the natural-gas industry and its effect or probable effect on other fuels and other industries. The pipe lines and their prospective uses figured largely in testimony during hearings before the Commission. The Commission is now preparing its report. This agency of the Government has been charged with original jurisdiction in drawing up national policies in this field. Let us wait, Mr. President, until it can report its findings and recommendations; let us study those recommendations, and then, in calm and deliberative manner, decide what we want done, with full realization of the effects of our decision on the economies of large sections of our Nation.

I am sure that every Member of the Senate can understand the importance of this issue. Were the Government, by the provision of special facilities to a competing industry, to encourage, let us say, the ruination of the cotton industry, every Senator from the South would, with real justification, bitterly object. Senators from other sections would rise and oppose with every means at their command special governmental favors to industries which would spell disaster for the economic future of groups much smaller than the 2,000,000 who might be adversely affected by use of these pipe lines for natural gas.

There is now before the Senate Committee on Armed Services a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 20) which would extend for a period of sixty additional days after February 3 the period in which Congress may take action to modify the recommendations made by the War Assets Administrator in the disposition of these pipe lines. That measure has real merit. Mr. President, I believe that the Senate needs more time, and that before acting it should have the benefit of hearings, advice, information, and recomendations from the Federal Power Commission on this general subject.

I invite the attention of the President pro tempore to the fact that pipe lines come under the jurisdiction of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce under the Congressional Reorganization Act, and I respectfully suggest that my joint resolution, dealing more broadly with policy in regard to pipe lines than with the specific Surplus Property Act provision to which Senate Joint Resolution 20 is directed, be referred to the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Can the Senator tell me what the occasion is for this particular speech? Is the claim made that the pipe lines have already been sold, or are they being advertised for sale?

Mr. MYERS. Under the Surplus Property Act the Administrator recommends that the pipe lines be disposed of.

Mr. LANGER. Has he made such a recommendation?

Mr. MYERS. His recommendation came to Congress on January 3. We must act within 30 days. If we do not act, then he may dispose of the pipe lines to any person who may bid, to whom he may desire to sell.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator is aware of the fact that these pipe lines cost our Government $141,000,000 or $142,000,000, and that we made a profit on them of $138,000,000. As a matter of fact, our Government has practically nothing invested in the pipe lines, has it?

Mr. MYERS. That is approximately true.

Mr. LANGER. In the last Congress I introduced a bill providing that the Government should simply retain ownership of the pipe lines. Can the Senator see any objection to keeping them in the possession of the Government, so that they will be available in case of necessity? There is no necessity for their sale.

Mr. MYERS. The pipe lines might be put to some good use. I am only arguing that to use them for natural gas would not only not be putting them to a good use, but would be destructive of a great industry, affecting 2,000,000 people.

Mr. LANGER. I understand the Senator's argument; but the Government has practically nothing invested. What objection could there be to the Government continuing to own the pipe lines?

Mr. MYERS. The Senator may be correct. I am not prepared to say at this time that there is not some good economic use for the pipe lines. The Senator may be correct in his view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania introduces a joint resolution which he asks to have referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MYERS. I did not ask that it be so referred. I merely pointed out that another measure dealing with somewhat the same subject had been referred to the Committee on Armed Services. I merely introduce the joint resolution and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the opinion of the Chair that the joint resolution should go with the other joint resolution, to the Committee on Armed Services. If that is unsatisfactory to the Senator from Pennsylvania the Chair wishes to give the Senator an opportunity to move a different reference.

Mr. MYERS. No, Mr. President. I do not believe that any Senator should ask that a bill or resolution be referred to a particular committee. I merely pointed out to the Chair that I thought this measure differed in some respects from the other. I did not ask, and would not urge, that the Chair refer it to any particular committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would agree with the Senator if the property had left the control and ownership of the Government.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 34) prohibiting War Assets Administration from disposing of certain pipe lines and facilities used for transporting oil until 6 months after final report and recommendations of the Federal Power Commission in its docket No. G–580 have been submitted to the Congress, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have listened with interest to the Senator from Pennsylvania. What would the Senator do with these pipe lines? The Government has more than $100,000,000 invested in them. I understand that the investment of the Government is aproximately $147,000,000. If the Government does not sell them or use them, would the Senator leave them in the ground to rust? What would he do with them?

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from North Dakota has just propounded that question to me. I stated that I doubted very much if that was the proper way to handle the subject of the pipe lines. I stated that I thought probably there might be some good economic use to which they could be put. However, Mr. Symington, the former Administrator, originally filed a report with the Congress recommending that they be used for petroleum products. His successor has changed the policy, and advocates that they be used for petroleum or for natural gas. I am only objecting to the use of the pipe lines for natural gas. I am not objecting to the use of the pipe lines for transportation of other petroleum products.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO STATES IN EQUALIZING EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, earlier today I introduced for appropriate reference a bill to authorize an appropriation of funds to assist the States in more nearly equalizing educational opportunities among and within States by establishing a national floor under educational expenditures per pupil in average daily attendance at public elementary and secondary schools and by assistance to nonpublic tax-exempt schools of secondary grade or less for necessary transportation of pupils, school health examinations, and related school health services, and purchase of nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with an analysis which contains two or three tables, be printed in the body of the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill and analysis will be printed as requested.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. AIKEN. This bill, divided into two titles, to be cited as the Educational Finance Act of 1947, represents a new and somewhat different approach to the problem of Federal aid to education in the States than the Congress has heretofore considered. There exists today a widespread conviction as to the imperative need for Federal financial assistance to the States for the purpose of assuring more uniformly adequate educational opportunities. This need is underscored by the increasingly critical shortage of qualified teachers, a shortage generally attributable to the shamefully low salaries paid teachers; which, in turn, is due in large areas of the Nation to the inability of States and local communities to provide the necessary financial support for education.

How shall this need best be met? Shall it be by taxing the wealth of the Nation wherever it exists for the support of education in only the poorer States? Or shall it be by the establishment of a national floor under educational expenditures in all States in relation to the number of pupils in average daily attendance? The former would require fewer Federal dollars than the latter; but would leave the incidence of taxation for the support of education where it now largely rests, that is, on real estate and other tangible personal property. The latter method, recognizing that the national interest in more adequate educational opportunities extends to every pupil, uses the tax sources available to the Federal Government to tap wealth where it exists for the benefit of the education of children wherever they are. It would result in shifting a portion of the tax load for the support of education from the shoulders of the real-estate owner in each local district, where it now rests far too heavily, to the shoulders of all who contribute through direct and indirect taxes to the Federal Treasury. It would result in leveling the expenditures per pupil in average daily attendance in the schools of each local school administrative unit in all States but especially in the poorer States.

Another new feature of S. 199 is contained in title II, which has for its purpose the provision of a modicum of relief to those who now support nonpublic tax-exempt schools of secondary grade or less. Under this title such schools would be reimbursed for not to exceed 60 percent of the cost of providing necessary pupil transportation, school health examinations, and related school health services, and purchase of nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books. The rationale supporting the granting of financial aid from the National Treasury to nonpublic tax-exempt schools was set forth in a separate statement of views, to which I subscribed, which accompanied Senate Report 1497 during the last Congress, and from which I quote:

> Implicit in the concept of democracy are differences of opinion, philosophy, and culture. It is not democracy's function to destroy these differences, but to provide a healthful and proper environment in which they can flourish and mature, or perhaps wither and die, and in which the values they develop may be integrated into the culture and thought of all Americans. Thus, as we see it, the Federal Government in providing aid to education must be careful not only not to interfere with local and State systems of education but not to encourage or discourage one system of education as against the other. Its aim must be the general welfare of all its citizens. Federal aid to education must not operate merely for the benefit of some children, be their number ever so large, but for all children. To do otherwise would, in effect, penalize those who are not eligible to receive the benefits of the act, and inequity would result.

The bill which I have introduced frankly faces the most difficult issue in Federal aid to education by proposing a plan which would authorize the use of tax moneys collected by the Federal Government to reimburse nonpublic tax-exempt schools of noncollegiate grade for an important part of their expense of operation, namely the provision of necessary pupil transportation, school health examinations and related school health services, and nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books. The principle of such aid has already been recognized in legal provisions for tax exemption for such schools. The further extension of this principle to include reimbursement for an important part of the operating expenses of nonpublic tax-exempt schools is proposed as a measure of equity that would be both generally acceptable and practicable in administration.

Briefly summarized, the proposed Educational Finance Act of 1947:

First. Includes absolutely no Federal control of the administration of education in the States.

Second. Recognizes the complete responsibility of State educational agencies for the administration of public education in the States and wholly depends upon those agencies to carry that responsibility.

Third. Is designed markedly to equalize educational opportunities among and within the States.

Fourth. Assures in each local school district in all States by 1953 a national floor for education equal to at least $100 a year per pupil in average daily attendance.

Fifth. Applies to the Nation as a whole the sound and time-honored principle of school support traditionally recognized in the States and local communities, namely, "tax the wealth equitably wherever it exists; expend the revenue equitably in terms of the number of pupils to be educated wherever the pupils are."

Sixth. Is brief, easy for all to understand, and simple of administration. It contains no complicated formulas.

Seventh. Will undoubtedly relieve the burden of taxation on real estate for the support of schools in practically all local school districts.

Eighth. Extends aid to pupils of private tax-exempt schools for necessary transportation, school health examinations, and related school health services and nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. How does this bill differ from the bill for which we voted 2 years ago? I believe it was Senate bill 667.

Mr. AIKEN. I have not read that bill.

Mr. LANGER. We voted on it 2 years ago.

Mr. AIKEN. I think, if the Senator will read this bill, he will find that it differs radically in its make-up from any bill which has ever been introduced or acted upon heretofore.

Mr. LANGER. How does it differ from the Mead-Aiken bill of the last session?

Mr. AIKEN. This one is very much simpler. There is no formula whatsoever for allocating funds. This provides for an appropriation of $20 per pupil in the public schools, increasing $10 a year until it reaches $60 per pupil. It makes appropriations for health services and certain amounts in nonpublic schools. The amount that could be allocated to a pupil in a nonpublic school or private school, such as the old academies in New England, would not be over a third to a half as much per pupil as would be allocated to students in public schools.

Mr. LANGER. At the time we had hearings on S. 667 the testimony was that in one State—I shall not mention the State now—a white child received, roughly, $51.12 a year, and a colored child received approximately $12. Would a continuation of that discrimination be permitted in case this bill should pass?

Mr. AIKEN. Not to that extent. This bill would not provide equality among all schools. It would require that after 1953 a pupil in any State must have at least $100 expended on him in 1 year for his education. There is no restriction, however, against expending $125 per pupil in any locality if the State can afford it. The bill puts a floor under the education of all children, regardless of race, creed, or color

Mr. LANGER. But the discrimination as to the amount spent by a State could still continue under the terms of this bill?

Mr. AIKEN. This bill simply put a floor under the education of all children which is considerably higher than it is today in a great many sections of the country.

Mr. LANGER. In other words, a certain amount of money would have to be spent for the education of every child?

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. LANGER. But a State which wished to do so could continue to discriminate?

Mr. AIKEN. Any State which had schools for different races could continue to spend $25 a year more for white children so long as it spent $100 a year for the education of colored children.

Mr. LANGER. There might still be a difference in a State in which $400 a year would be spent for the education of a white child and, say, $10 a year for the education of a colored child?

Mr. AIKEN. No; they would have to spend $100 a year for every child, compared with $10 which the Senator refers to now. I do not know to what State or what locality he may be referring, but I understand that there are some localities where there is great discrimination. That is not proper because every child, regardless of race, creed, or color, has the right to the adequate education which this bill would provide. I do not think there is any way that we can provide that education in all schools in the same State or the same county shall be equal; but this bill seeks to provide a floor which will mean that every child in the country will have an adequate education, regardless of his color or condition.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, let me inquire whether the Senator from Vermont would have any objection to a provision or an amendment to be made to the bill to the effect that no State could receive any of the money to be provided in connection with the bill unless the white and colored children within the State were treated equally, under the laws of the State.

Mr. AIKEN. I think this bill would require that twice as much be spent on colored children as is spent now in States which perhaps the Senator has in mind. In formulating the bill I took into consideration the needs of children all over the country and also the practical matter of getting the bill enacted, and I tried to overcome the objections which might be raised and which have been raised to the various bills on the subject which have been introduced heretofore. If the Senator will study carefully the bill and the analysis of it which I am having printed in the RECORD, I think he will come to the conclusion that it gives at least a modicum of equality to all children, although I do not think the time ever will come when all children will be educated in schools of exactly the same caliber or at exactly the same cost.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the explanation and for giving me the time to ask these questions, because in the entire Senate of the United States there is not a more sincere friend of education and of the children of the United States than the senior Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator.

EXHIBIT A

S. 199

A bill to authorize the appropriation of funds to assist the States in more nearly equalizing educational opportunities among and within the States by establishing a national floor under current educational expenditures per pupil in average daily attendance at public elementary and secondary schools and by assistance to nonpublic tax-exempt schools of secondary grade or less for necessary transportation of pupils, school health examinations and related school health services, and purchase of nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books

Be it enacted, etc., That this act, divided into two titles, may be cited as the Education Finance Act of 1947.

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby declares that in order to provide for the common defense and to promote the general welfare it shall be the national policy to provide for the greater equalization of educational opportunities among and within the States and Territories (a) by the establishment of a national floor under current educational expenditures per pupil in average daily attendance at all public elementary and secondary schools and (b) by the payment of not to exceed 60 percent of the cost of providing necessary transportation of pupils, school health examinations and related school health services, and purchase of nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books for pupils attending nonpublic tax-exempt elementary and secondary schools.

ALLOTMENT TO STATES

SEC. 102. The amounts appropriated under section 101 shall be allotted to the respective States in the ratio that the number of pupils in average daily attendance at all public elementary and public secondary schools in each such State during the second year next preceding the year for which an appropriation is made under this title bears to the total number of pupils in average daily attendance at all such schools in all the States during such year.

AVAILABILITY OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 103. (a) In order to be eligible to receive funds under section 101 and section 102 of this title, a State through its legislature, shall—

(1) accept the provisions of this title and provide for the administration of funds to be received;

(2) provide that the State treasurer, or corresponding official in the State, shall be the custodian of the funds paid to the State under this title;

(3) designate or create a State educational authority having all necessary powers to determine policies under which, in accordance with the provisions of this title, the funds allotted to the States shall be distributed and expended;

(2) for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, and for any succeeding fiscal year, a State shall have spent for current expenses in each local school administrative unit from all revenue sources (including funds received under this act) during the second next preceding fiscal year a sum per pupil in average daily attendance at the public elementary and secondary schools in such unit during such second next preceding fiscal year (A) not less than $50 in the case of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, (B) not less than $60 in the case of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1949, (C) not less than $70 in the case of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, (D) not less than $80 in the case of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, (E) not less than $90 in the case of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1952, and (F) not less than $100 in the case of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1953, and in the case of fiscal years ending thereafter;

(3) for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, and for each succeeding fiscal year, a State which maintains by law separate schools for separate population groups shall have complied with the requirements of subparagraph (2) with respect to the schools maintained for each such separate population group in each local school administrative unit.

The Secretary shall, through the Fiscal Service of the Treasury Department and prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, pay to the treasurer or corresponding official of such State the amount so certified for each fiscal year in two equal installments as soon after the first day of September and March as may be feasible, beginning with the fiscal year for which appropriations made under the authorization of this title become available. Each such treasurer shall account for the moneys received as trustee and shall pay out such funds only on the requisition of the State educational authority.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 105. No department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States shall exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the personnel, curriculum, or program of instruction of any school or school system to which funds have been allotted or paid under this act.

SEC. 106. The United States Commissioner of Education, under the supervision of the Administrator, Federal Security Agency, shall be responsible for the administration of this act; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually to the Office of Education such sums as may be necessary for its efficient administration. The Commissioner shall cause an annual audit to be made of the expenditure of funds under this title by each State. If the Commissioner, after notice and hearing, finds that any portion of such funds has been used by any State in a manner contrary to the provisions of this title or has been lost or otherwise unlawfully used, he shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall withhold from the next ensuing payment to any such State an amount equal to that improperly used, lost, or unlawfully used, until such time as the State shall have replaced such amount and expended it for the purpose originally intended. The Commissioner shall include in his annual report to the Congress a full report of the administration of this act.

EXPLANATION OF EDUCATIONAL FINANCE ACT OF 1947

PURPOSE

Section 2, Declaration of Policy, states: "In order to provide for the common defense and to promote the general welfare it shall be the national policy to provide for the greater equalization of educational opportunities among and within the States and Territories." This purpose is to be accomplished (1) by the establishment of a uniform national floor under current educational expenditures per pupil in average daily attendance at all public elementary and public secondary schools; (2) by contributing to the equalization of educational opportunities for children whose parents feel constrained to send them to nonpublic tax-exempt schools of secondary grade or less through providing Federal grants sufficient to pay not to exceed 60 percent of the cost of providing necessary pupil transportation, school health examinations and related school health services and nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books, for such schools. The means for the accomplishment of these two purposes are set forth in titles I and II, respectively.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS (TITLE I)

Section 101 of title I authorizes the appropriation of amounts as follows:

For the fiscal year 1948, $20 per pupil reported in average daily attendance during 1946.

For the fiscal year 1949, $30 per pupil reported in average daily attendance during 1947.

For the fiscal year 1950, $40 per pupil reported in average daily attendance during 1948.

For the fiscal year 1951, $50 per pupil reported in average daily attendance during 1949.

For the fiscal year 1952 and each fiscal year thereafter, $60 per pupil reported in average daily attendance during the second preceding fiscal year.

It is estimated that the appropriations so authorized would amount to approximately $400,000,000 for the fiscal year 1948; $600,000,000 for the fiscal year 1949; $800,000,000 for the fiscal year 1950; $1,000,000,000 for the fiscal year 1951; and $1,200,000,000 for the fiscal year 1952 and thereafter.

In arriving at these estimates 19,602,772 was taken as the number of pupils in average daily attendance in public elementary and public secondary schools of the continental United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, as reported to the United States Office of Education. Assuming a national income for the fiscal year 1952 of $150,000,000,000 the Federal appropriation of $1,200,000,000 for that year under the terms of the proposed act would amount to less than 1 percent of the total national income.

BASIS OF ALLOTMENT TO THE STATES (TITLE I)

Funds are to be distributed to the States in proportion to the number of pupils in average daily attendance in all public elementary and public secondary schools of the State during the second fiscal year next preceding the year for which an appropriation is made. Thus the appropriation for the fiscal year 1948 would be distributed on the basis of State reports of the number of pupils in average daily attendance for 1946. This provides sufficient time for all States to secure and compile accurate and uniform statistics concerning the number of pupils in average daily attendance and concerning their expenditures per pupil for current expense and to report the same to the Commissioners as the basis for allotment of funds. Table I, which follows, shows allotments to States for the fiscal years 1948 and 1952. This table is necessarily based upon statistics of average daily attendance for the fiscal year 1944, the latest year for which such statistics were available from the United States Office of Education.

[1] Average daily attendance.

The basis for the distribution of allotments to the States contained in section 102 and illustrated in table I recognizes:

(1) That the national interest in education extends to each and every pupil in attendance at public elementary and secondary schools;

(2) That the contribution of the Nation to the support of education in the States is, therefore, best related directly to the educational load that each States carries as measured by the number of pupils in average daily attendance;

(3) That the Federal Government through its fiscal policies and machinery should collect taxes from all citizens in relation to their ability to pay;

(4) That a portion of the tax moneys so collected by the Federal Government should be returned to the States for educational purposes in direct proportion to the number of pupils being educated;

(5) That the Federal funds so returned to the States should provide a uniform national floor under education, thereby contributing markedly to the equalization of educational opportunity among and within the States.

AVAILABILITY OF APPROPRIATIONS (TITLE I)

Section 103, Availability of appropriations, sets forth explicitly and completely each and every Federal condition for the receipt of funds by a State. These Federal conditions or standards are of two general types, the first having to do with State acceptance of the Federal grants, safeguarding of the funds, assuring expenditure only for the national purpose intended by the Congress. Thus, to receive its allotment, a State through its legislature must (a) accept the provisions of the act, (b) provide for official custody of the funds, (c) designate or create a State educational authority to be responsible for the policies under which the funds are used within the State, (d) provide for an audit by the State of the expenditure of Federal funds by local school jurisdictions, (e) provide for a system of reports from these local school jurisdictions to the State educational authority, (f) provide for reports from the State educational authority to the United States Commissioner of Education.

The second type of Federal condition, set forth in paragraph (b) of section 103, is in the nature of required matching from State and local revenue sources of the Federal funds allotted to the States. Thus, States must (1) continue to spend per pupil in average daily attendance for current expense from State and local resources at least as much as they had been spending in the fiscal year 1946, or $100, whichever is the lesser amount; (2) spend from all sources, namely, Federal, State, and total in 1948, and thereafter an amount per pupil in average daily attendance not less than the specified minima until the national minimum or level floor of $100 per pupil is reached in the fiscal year 1953 and thereafter.

Table II indicates how the standards respecting the availability of Federal funds would operate to establish a national floor under educational expenditures for current operating expenses in each local school administrative unit by 1953 of not less than $100 per pupil in average daily attendance.

[1] Average daily attendance.

Column 2 of table II shows by States the expenditures for current expenses per pupil in average daily attendance for the fiscal year 1944.[2] These expenditures range from an average of $42.25 per pupil in Mississippi to $185.12 per pupil in New York. It may be fairly assumed that the expenditures of these various States as shown in column 2 represent about what the citizens through the years have found it practicable to do in support of education in their respective States by employing State and local revenue sources.

Column 3 of table II shows how in the fiscal year 1953 and thereafter a national uniform floor under educational expenditures of $100 per pupil in average daily attendance would be achieved.

Beginning with the fiscal year 1952, Federal grants-in-aid (column 4) would total $60 per pupil in average daily attendance. Each State would be required as a condition for the receipt of the Federal grants to expend from State and local revenue sources at least $40 per pupil (column 5) thus assuring the national floor of $100 per pupil.

Column 6 shows the additional amounts, i. e., in addition to the required minimum of $100 per pupil in average daily attendance from all sources, which States would at their own option need to provide from State and local revenue sources if they should desire to equal their expenditures per pupil in average daily attendance for the fiscal year 1944.[2]

Undoubtedly most of the States will wish to provide a richer educational program than that represented by an expenditure per pupil in average daily attendance of $100. The States which were expending more than $100 per pupil in 1946, such as New York, New Jersey, California, and others, would have the choice from the beginning of the operation of the act in 1948 of using all or part of their share of the Federal grants either (1) as an offset for State and local taxes for the support of elementary and secondary schools or (2) to improve still further their systems of education. Other States, such as Mississippi, Arkansas, Alabama, Georgia, and others (see table II), which were expending less than $100 per pupil in 1946 would each year have to continue to spend from State and local revenue sources at least as much as they had been spending in 1946 until such time as the combined expenditure from Federal, State, and local sources reached or exceeded $100 per pupil.

[2] Data for 1944 are useful in table II for illustrative purposes only since that is the latest year for which data were available. The bill itself requires that figures for 1946 be used.

TABLE III

Fiscal or allotment year	Amount of Federal allotments	Conditions States must meet to qualify to receive Federal allotments
1948	$20 per pupil in average daily attendance during 1946.
1949	$30 per pupil in average daily attendance during 1947.
1950	$40 per pupil in average daily attendance during 1948.	(a) Must have spent from State and local revenue sources in 1948 not less than amount per pupil in average daily attendance spent during fiscal 1946, or $100, whichever is the lesser amount. (b) Must have spent from all revenue sources in 1948 not less than $50 per pupil in average daily attendance in each local school administrative unit.
1951	$50 per pupil in average daily attendance during 1949.	(a) Must have spent from State and local revenue sources in 1949 not less than amount per pupil in average daily attendance spent during fiscal 1946, or $100, whichever is the lesser amount. (b) Must have spent from all revenue sources in 1949 not less than $60 per pupil in average daily attendance in each local school administrative unit.
1952	$60 per pupil in average daily attendance during 1950.	(a) Must have spent from State and local revenue sources in 1950 not less than amount per pupil in average daily attendance spent during fiscal 1946, or $100, whichever is the lesser amount. (b) Must have spent from all revenue sources in 1950 not less than $70 per pupil in average daily attendance in each local school administrative unit.
1953	$60 per pupil in average daily attendance during 1951.	(a) Must have spent from State and local revenue sources in 1951 not less than amount per pupil in average daily attendance spent during fiscal 1946, or $100, whichever is the lesser amount. (b) Must have spent from all revenue sources in 1951 not less than $80 per pupil in average daily attendance in each local school administrative unit.
1954	$60 per pupil in average daily attendance during 1952.	(a) Must have spent from State and local revenue sources in 1952 not less than amount per pupil in average daily attendance spent during fiscal 1946, or $100, whichever is the lesser amount. (b) Must have spent from all revenue sources in 1952 not less than $90 per pupil in average daily attendance in each local school administrative unit.
1955	$60 per pupil in average daily attendance during 1953.	(a) Must have spent from State and local revenue sources in 1953 not less than amount per pupil in average daily attendance spent during fiscal 1946, or $100, whichever is the lesser amount. (b) Must have spent from all revenue sources in 1953 not less than $100 per pupil in average daily attendance in each local school administrative unit.

Table III shows in tabular form for succeeding allotment years beginning with 1948 the amount of the Federal allotments and the conditions States must meet to qualify for the receipt of the allotments. Thus, in 1948 all States would receive $20 for each pupil they reported as having been in average daily attendance during the second fiscal year preceeding 1948, i. e., 1946.

For the allotment year 1949 all States would receive $30 for each pupil they reported as having been in average daily attendance during 1947.

In order to be eligible to receive the 1950 allotment, States must meet two conditions: (a) they must have spent from State and local revenue sources in 1948 an amount per pupil in average daily attendance not less than that spent during 1946, or $100, whichever is the lesser amount; and (b) they must have spent from all revenue sources in 1948 an amount not less than $50 per pupil in average daily attendance in each local administrative unit.

To illustrate, let us take the State of Mississippi. In 1948, in order to receive its Federal allotment of $20 per pupil in average daily attendance Mississippi, having accepted the provisions of the act, would merely report to the United States Office of Education the number of pupils that had been in average daily attendance during 1946 and the amount of the State's expenditure per pupil in average daily attendance during that year for current operating expenses. Assuming, for purposes of illustration, that the number of pupils in average daily attendance and the amount of Mississippi's expenditure per pupil in average daily attendance were the same as those reported for 1944, i. e., 444,898 pupils and $42.25 per pupil in average daily attendance, respectively, then Mississippi would receive in 1948 an allotment in the amount of $20 per pupil in average daily attendance, or $8,897,960.

In 1949 Mississippi, in order to receive its allotment of $30 per pupil reported as having been in average daily attendance during 1947, again would merely report to the United States Office of Education the number of pupils in average daily attendance and the amount spent per pupil in average daily attendance during 1947 from State and local revenue sources.

Beginning in 1950, in order to qualify to receive its Federal allotment of $40 per pupil reported as having been in average daily attendance during 1948, Mississippi's report to the United States Commissioner of Education would have to indicate (a) that it had spent from State and local revenue sources in 1948 an amount per pupil in average daily attendance not less than that spent during 1946, or $100, whichever is the lesser amount; and (b) that it had spent from all revenue sources, i. e. Federal, State, and local, in 1948 not less than $50 per pupil in average daily attendance in each local school administrative unit. Since Mississippi would know, when it received its first allotment of $20 per pupil in 1948, that this standard would have to be met as a condition precedent to the receipt of its 1950 allotment, it would govern itself accordingly in the distribution of the Federal allotment to local school administrative units within the State and would thus not only raise the general level of education throughout the State but would secure a marked increase in equalization of educational opportunities within and among all local school districts.

Missouri, on the other hand, since it was already spending in 1944 (and presumably in 1946 and thereafter) at least $100 per pupil in average daily attendance (see table II), would have the option from the beginning of the operation of the act of using all or part of its Federal allotment either to improve its educational program or to reduce the burden of school taxation resting upon State and local revenue sources by substituting Federal dollars for State or local dollars above the stipulated national minima, provided only that it met the stipulated national minimum expenditures in each local administrative unit.

ADMINISTRATION (TITLE II)

Administration is by the United States Commissioner of Education. Section 105 expressly prohibits any Federal control over personnel, curriculum, or program of instruction of any school or school system in any State receiving or expending Federal funds. The Commissioner has no authority under the act except to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amounts to be allotted to each State which has accepted provisions of the act and otherwise qualified under section 103 to receive an allotment. The Commissioner is required to make a Federal audit of State expenditures under the act but this audit extends merely to the determination of whether or not the funds have been used to equalize educational expenditures per pupil in average daily attendance at public elementary and secondary schools in each local school administrative unit up to the amounts stipulated in section 102 of the act.

It is the intention of the act to require States to continue to expend from State and local tax sources only so much as is necessary when added to the Federal allotments to attain the specified minimum or national floors. Any States which have been spending from State and local revenue sources an amount or amounts per pupil in average daily attendance in every local school administrative unit greater than those specified in section 103 may, if they choose, use part or all of the Federal grant either to relieve State and local educational tax burdens or to improve still further their educational programs.

PURPOSE OF TITLE II

Title II has for its purpose assistance to nonpublic tax-exempt schools of secondary grade or less by reimbursing them for not to exceed 60 percent of their actual annual expenses incurred in providing (a) necessary transportation of pupils, (b) school health examinations and related school health services, and (c) purchase of nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books.

The case for some financial aid from the National Treasury to nonpublic tax-exempt schools has been ably stated in the separate statement of views by myself, Senators Murray, Walsh, and Morse accompanying Senate Report 1497 on S. 181, Seventy-ninth Congress, second session, from which I quote:

"In spite of evidence to the contrary, some people sincerely fear that Federal aid to church-controlled schools would bring about the union of church and state. We have considered this problem very carefully and we have concluded that such a fear is groundless. If it were not, we would be the first to oppose such aid. Another tenet of our democratic belief which we hold to be just as sacred and important as the separation of church and state is that of freedom of religion. Such freedom should not be limited by imposing, in effect, certain penalties on those who faithfully carry out the practice and teachings of their religion. In this connection, also, we must recognize that the Government does not wish to supplant the duty of parents in the instruction and training of their children, but merely wishes to supplement and facilitate it."

The bill proposes frankly to face the public-private-church-school issue through a plan which would authorize the use of tax moneys collected by the Federal Government from all the Nation's citizens to reimburse nonpublic, tax-exempt schools of noncollegiate grade for an important part of their expense of operation, namely the provision of necessary pupil transportation services, school-health examinations and related school health services, the purchase of nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books, to be provided to pupils attending such schools. Such aid from tax sources would encourage the establishment of privately controlled schools of secondary grade or less. Some encouragement to such schools has long been given by existing legal provisions for tax exemption. The provisions of title II carry encouragement one step further by relieving somewhat the competitive disadvantage under which the nonpublic tax-exempt schools at present operate.

AMOUNT AUTHORIZED AND BASIS OF ESTIMATE (TITLE II)

On the basis of an estimated 1944 average daily attendance of 2,203,121 pupils in nonpublic tax-exempt elementary and secondary schools the amount annually authorized for appropriation by section 201, i. e., $60,000,000, amounts to approximately $20,000,000 more than the 60 percent of an estimated $30 per pupil in average daily attendance, i. e., $10 for pupil transportation; $5 for health examinations and related school health services; $15 for nonreligious instructional supplies and equipment, including books. The amount of the appropriation authorized should be sufficient, therefore, to provide for reimbursement of expenditures for increased enrollments up to a total of approximately 3,333,333 pupils in nonpublic tax-exempt elementary and secondary schools.

AVAILABILITY OF APPROPRIATIONS (TITLE II)

To qualify to receive Federal-aid funds nonpublic tax-exempt schools or school systems must submit either to the State educational authority or to the United States Commissioner of Education an application for reimbursement together with a report of their average daily attendance and of their expenditures for the aided purposes for which reimbursement is claimed. They must also agree to permit a State or Federal inspection or audit of their accounts of such expenditures.

The purpose of these conditions is simply to safeguard the expenditure of the Federal funds for the purposes specified. No direct or indirect controls of the operations of the schools receiving reimbursement is made possible.

AMERICA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on Saturday evening the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate made his first address to the public in his new capacity as the eminent chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The able Senator from Michigan spoke with his characteristic candor, conviction, sincerity, and eloquence. With many of the remarks which he made on that occasion I am in the most hearty accord. I especially take note of the vigorous, able statement of the senior Senator from Michigan in his declared advocacy of reciprocal-trade agreements. I commend the Senator from Michigan upon that farsighted policy. I hope he will be able to carry with him not only his party but the Senate, as well.

I especially commend the Senator from Michigan upon the following statement which he made in the course of his speech:

In any event, partisan politics, for most of us, stopped at the water's edge. I hope they stay stopped—for the sake of America—regardless of what party is in power. This does not mean that we cannot have earnest, honest, even vehement domestic differences of opinion on foreign policy. It is no curb on free opinion or free speech. But it does mean that they should not root themselves in partisanship. We should ever strive to hammer out a permanent American foreign policy, in basic essentials, which serves all America and deserves the approval of all American-minded parties at all times.

Nothing could be more appropriate or fair than that statement, Mr. President. I am glad to hear the Senator from Michigan declare that principle, namely, that in regard to a matter respecting the foreign policy of this country, on something as vital to the people of this Nation as war or peace, we may all honestly and with equal patriotism speak our honest sentiments.

There are many other sentiments in the address which I could and would commend, were I to take the time to refer to them specifically. But there are two portions of the Senator's address to which I feel I am not in position to give my concurrence. And I think the Senate owes it to the world to let it be known that there may be differences of opinion in this body, as well as perhaps in this country, as to those two particular points which were emphasized by the Senator from Michigan. In his address the Senator, turning to the Far East, said:

While recognizing the Nationalist government of Chiang Kai-shek, we have—through a year's mission headed by our distinguished General Marshall—been impartially urging that it produce unity with a rival armed party—the Chinese Communists. Under the determined leadership of Chiang Kai-shek, a national assembly has just produced a new constitution and the government has been reorganized with a coalition of non-Communist parties. We can hope that this Nanking charter, with its first great national election promised before next Christmas, will weld together a strong and competent China. It is my own view that our own far-eastern policy might well now shift its emphasis. While still recommending unity, it might well encourage those who have so heroically set their feet upon this road, and discourage those who make the road precarious.

Mr. President, those remarks on the part of the Senator from Michigan have especial significance, first because of his position as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and second because of his distinguished record, in collaborating with the able Secretary of State who has just resigned, with the able Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and with others of the American delegation, which would cause the world to place great emphasis upon the remarks of the able Senator from Michigan and probably to regard anything he said as being an expression of the two major parties of the United States.

Although I do not wish to suggest that the Senator from Michigan spoke other than in his individual capacity, because he said he spoke only for himself, yet, as I have said, so great is the prestige of the Senator from Michigan and such is his distinction as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that we must take particular care that his utterances may not be understood to be the expression of the opinion of the Senate of the United States, unless it should be hereafter declared to be the opinion of the Senate or of the Government of the United States and of the people of this country.

Mr. President, General Marshall, than whom no American today is more greatly honored or more highly esteemed, I think, has just been appointed by the President and been confirmed by the Senate of the United States to be Secretary of State of the United States. I pause here to say that in a conversation which I was privileged to have with Mr. Winston Churchill in London in 1945—and I quote the substance of Mr. Churchill's remarks—he said that in his opinion the greatest figure who had emerged from the war was Gen. George C. Marshall; and he paid detailed compliments to the magnificence of General Marshall as a military strategist, as a diplomat, as a soldier, and as a great citizen of America and of the world. For my part, I think the President could not have made a wiser choice than his choice of Gen. George C. Marshall.

General Marshall, as the able Senator from Michigan has pointed out, has just returned from a year's mission in China, where he engaged in a strenuous and commendable effort to bring together the people of that war-torn and chaotic country into a new democratic unity. He has risked his life, and labored endless hours, in an effort to bring together the government headed by Chiang Kai-shek with the non-Chiang Kai-shek elements in China, principally the Communist group, which he said, and told the Foreign Relations Committee, are not directed from Moscow, which constitute 90,000,000 of the people of that country, and have an army of a million to bring them into a new accord, so that there may be peace in that ancient and great country.

General Marshall has told us in his report that he has other ideas than those expressed by the Senator from Michigan. He says:

Between this dominant reactionary group in the Government and the irreconcilable Communists, who, I must state, did not so appear last February, lies the problem of how peace and well-being are to be brought to the long-suffering and recently inarticulate mass of the people of China.

I am quoting from the Evening Star's report of January 7 of General Marshall's statement. I continue to quote:

The reactionaries in the Government have evidently counted on substantial American support regardless of their actions. The Communists by their unwillingness to compromise in the national interest are evidently counting on economic collapse to bring about the fall of the Government, accelerated by extensive guerrilla action against the long lines of rail communications, regardless of the cost in suffering to the Chinese people.

I quote further from General Marshall, and this is General Marshall's suggestion for the future of China and the policy of America, made on his way back from China after a year's mission there:

The salvation of the situation, as I see it, would be assumption of leadership by the liberals in the government and in the minority parties, a splendid group of men, but who, as yet, lack the political power to exercise a controlling influence. Successful action on their part under the leadership of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek would, I believe, lead to unity through good government.

Mr. President, I am not the only one who has detected a difference in policy between the able Senator from Michigan, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and the new Secretary of State, who has made that declaration of principle. I am reading now from the columns of Joseph and Stewart Alsop in the Washington Post of January 15. I quote:

In his important speech at Cleveland, Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG specifically demanded overt support for Chiang. He did not insert the proviso which General Marshall wisely insists upon. But Marshall should have no difficulty in harmonizing VANDENBERG'S view with his own, since VANDENBERG will be the first to acknowledge that there is no sense in aiding a regime which is inherently a bad investment.

Mr. President, all I wish to say is that I was a little surprised that the new chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations would lay down what obviously the people of China, and many other parts of the world, would take as American policy, coming from the chairman of the committee and an illustrious representative of the American Government in many councils of the world, on a matter which was in the intimate knowledge of the new Secretary of State, before the Secretary of State was sworn in, and in the opinion of many of us, including Mr. Alsop, in contradiction to the recommendation of General Marshall as to what should be the policy of this country, for the future unity and security of the people of China.

I merely wish to state that for my part I do not desire to commit America to support, as General Marshall says they are expecting, and I quote again—

The reactionaries in the Government who have evidently counted on substantial American support regardless of their actions.

General Marshall says:

Now that the form for a democratic China has been laid down by the newly adopted constitution, practical measures will be the best. It remains to be seen to what extent the Government will give substance to the form by a genuine welcome of all groups actively to share in the responsibility of government.

As I have said, I merely wish it understood that neither the American Congress, or the American Government, has committed itself to give support to the corrupt, the reactionary, or the feudal element of China, any more than we would propose to give our support to the irreconcilables in the Communist Party, whom General Marshall, with equal and impartial severity, has condemned.

Mr. President, it must not be understood in any part of the world that America is associating itself with the reactionary, the corrupt, or the backward-looking elements where the people are endeavoring to find a new highway for prosperity and peace for the people in those lands.

Mr. President, I turn to a reference in the able chairman's speech to South America and to what our policy should be with respect to Argentina. The able chairman in his address used the following words:

But I think it is past time to hold the Pan-American Conference which we promised in 1945, and there to formally renew the joint New World authority which is the genius of our New World unity.

On the same evening the Secretary of State, Hon. James F. Byrnes, spoke to the same audience. I have said here in the Senate that I have not concurred in all aspects of our foreign policy, but I was glad I had the privilege to pay tribute to Hon. James F. Byrnes, who I believe will be remembered in the history of this country by a grateful citizenry as one of the most distinguished Secretaries of State we have ever had. Speaking on the same subject, on the same occasion as the Senator from Michigan, this is what the Secretary of State said:

It was our fostering of a common fellowship that gave vitality to the good-neighbor policy in the Americas. It was a common fellowship which made the act of Chapultepec possible.

We are eager to proceed with the negotiation of a mutual-assistance treaty in accordance with the act of Chapultepec at the projected Rio de Janeiro Conference. But we do not wish to proceed without Argentina, and neither our Ambassador nor any official of the State Department is of the opinion that Argentina has yet complied with the commitments which she, as well as the other American Republics at Chapultepec, agreed to carry out.

Again, Mr. President, the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has spoken upon a subject relating to a vital matter in South America in direct contradiction to the present declared policy of the State Department, and before the new Secretary of State has had an opportunity to give expression to what should be the new policy of the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, I saw in the Evening Star 2 or 3 days ago a statement to the effect that Secretary Byrnes was denounced in Argentina. His critics tried to distinguish by saying they did not denounce him as Secretary of State, for what he said at Cleveland, they denounced him as a private citizen. Did the able chairman of the committee mean to leave the impression that the American Senate, or his committee, or this Government, or this people, is willing to embrace Argentina again to its breast before it has been found by our competent agencies that it has purged itself of its iniquitous collaboration with nazism during the war? Do we wish to lay ourselves open to the accusation by any such statements as this made by the Senator from Michigan that we are growing friendlier and friendlier with our proven enemies, and more inimical toward our proven friends?

Surely, Mr. President, it cannot be helpful to the new Secretary of State in trying to find the policy which will lead to harmony in this hemisphere, to have it already declared by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee before the new Secretary has taken office, that the present policy of the State Department is wrong and that another should be put in effect.

Again, I do not want any misunderstanding by the people of Argentina that the able Senator, eloquent and convincing as he is, speaks other than his own individual convictions or the convictions of those who concur with him in this matter.

I have said these things, Mr. President, with some hesitancy, because I feel that we must exercise the utmost restraint lest the impression go around the world that the American Government is getting closer and closer to the reactionary if not to the feudal and sometimes the corrupt and sometimes the fascistic influences of the various lands of the earth. I am sure that when we reflect upon it we want everybody to understand, as the Senator clearly said in another part of his address, that we are standing with those forces which stand for democracy and for peace. We want the world to enjoy, at long last, its deserved inheritance of both.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 46) continuing the authority for the investigation of the national defense program.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER].

Mr. KNOWLAND. On behalf of the junior Senator from Maine, I wish to offer a substitute for the amendment he had previously offered, which I send to the desk, and on his behalf I withdraw the amendment he previously submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the previous amendment is withdrawn and that a new amendment is offered.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct. The Senator from Maine is still here.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask that the substitute amendment may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the amendment in the nature of a substitute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. BREWSTER to the resolution (S. Res. 46) continuing the authority for the investigation of the national defense program. Strike out lines 12 and 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "defense program); is hereby continued during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eightieth Congress (except as hereinafter provided): Provided, That on and after the date this resolution is agreed to, the authority contained in such Senate Resolution 71 shall be limited, with respect to the subject matter authorized to be studied and investigated therein, to excessive profits, fraud, corruption, waste, extravagance, mismanagement, incompetence, and inefficiency in expenditures, connected with the prosecution of the national defense program for World War II: Provided further, That the foregoing authority shall be further limited to transactions which occurred within the United States (including Hawaii, Alaska, Panama, and Puerto Rico) prior to June 30, 1946: Provided further, That the committee shall report to the Senate the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations, as soon as practicable, but in no event later than January 31, 1948, at which time all powers and duties conferred upon the committee shall terminate."

Mr. AIKEN. May I ask how this differs from the amendment previously offered by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BREWSTER. I did not realize the Senator from Florida was going to speak on this issue. The new amendment adds Hawaii, Alaska, Panama, and Puerto Rico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the new amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I inquire of the majority leader what his plans are? It is obvious that we cannot vote today on the pending proposal, and at this hour it is a little unfair to expect Senators to begin speaking.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have sympathy with what the Senator from Kentucky has just said, but I express the hope that if we now adjourn we may be able to conclude the discussion and vote on this matter and finally dispose of it on Friday.

I think I ought to suggest that we probably will hold something like a continuous session on Friday, in an effort ultimately to dispose of the resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I say to the Senator that there is no disposition on this side to prolong the discussion or to delay a vote.

I wish to say that there are several Senators on this side who have prepared to address themselves to the matter of principle involved. It is important. We are beginning the session, and what we do may have a far-reaching effect upon the conduct of the Senate in the future, and I think it is a subject that is worthy of fair discussion.

While I share the hope that we may vote Friday, we know that as the debate proceeds, like that which took place today, it is impossible to know how long any Senator will occupy the floor, that depending on the number of questions asked him and his willingness to yield.

Fortunately, or unfortunately, none of those who oppose this resolution have had an opportunity today to discuss it except by interjection in the speeches of others.

I appreciate the willingness of the Senator from Maine that the matter go over until Friday, and I think there is a fair chance that we may be able to reach a conclusion then.

Mr. WHITE. I repeat, I appreciate, of course, the suggestion of the minority leader and his eminent fairness in all matters between the two sides, but I have been asked by some Senators to move to recess until Thursday. I think, having reached the agreement or the general understanding that we will meet on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, we ought not to depart from that understanding, certainly without giving adequate notice to all Members of the Senate, so that they could accommodate their commitments to the new situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. I share that view, and I appreciate the Senator's fairness about it.

I might say that the committee involved in the pending resolution will not expire until the 31st day of January. It is in existence now, and will continue until the end of this month. There is no other legislation ready for consideration, and therefore there is no rush sufficient to justify preventing what ought to be a fair and constructive discussion of the principle and merits of the question itself.

Mr. WHITE. I would have to agree with the Senator from Kentucky, but I still hope that we may ultimately dispose of the matter on Friday.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. May I inquire what is the last amendment that was sent to the desk?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last amendment is the final substitute language which the Senator from Maine requests be presented as the pending amendment, and it is now the pending amendment to the resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Chair means it is the final amendment unless another final amendment is brought in at a subsequent date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; it is the final amendment up to date.

Mr. LUCAS. This is not an amendment to an amendment; this is a substitute for the other amendment that was offered first?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine withdrew the other amendment and presented the new amendment, which is an amplification of the original.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Chair, and I should like to make this observation in the time of the able Senator from Maine, if I may, about this rush. It is now 5:15 o'clock on the first day of the debate, and it is suggested that now, for the first time, we have in final form the resolution the Senator wishes to have presented by his side. Perhaps when we meet again there will be another substitute. We began with the original resolution. Then an amendment was offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS], which was withdrawn. Then the Senator from Maine offered one, and he withdrew that and submitted another in its place. It is difficult for me to keep up with the amendments, and I should like a little time at least to look over the last amendment before we vote.

Mr. WHITE. I feel very sure that any amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois would be so clearly stated that we could all readily understand its purport.

Mr. LUCAS. I am not sure about that. I am not sure what these amendments mean. I do know what the investigating committee will do, once they go into action.

Mr. WHITE. Let me add just a further word. I think I ought to suggest to all Senators who are now present that it may seem necessary to run into the evening on Friday, if there will thereby be a chance to make final disposition of the pending measure.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. I rise to comment on the statement of the minority leader about the Democratic side not having had an opportunity to present its views this afternoon. I am sure he did not intend to minimize the contribution of the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] who addressed himself to this matter in his usual clear manner.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I am subject to that correction. The Senator from Utah spoke first after the Senate assembled, but the remainder of the day has been taken up with reports and other matters.

Mr. BREWSTER. I did not want it to seem that we had occupied all the time, and I think the RECORD also will indicate that there was great liberality in yielding by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] to the suggestions from the other side.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not criticizing, but I am calling attention to the fact that circumstances have prevented four or five Senators who have prepared themselves to discuss the matter on its merits from obtaining the floor, and I am sure nobody wishes to cut them off.

Mr. BREWSTER. Will the Senator from Maine yield further?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Replying to the Senator from Illinois, I will say that I submitted the revised amendment at this time in order that there should be full opportunity for everyone interested to become familiar with it. I am quite appreciative of the Senator's interest in the matter and the attention which he has given to it, and also of his comments regarding the provisions of the amendment.

RECESS TO FRIDAY

Mr. WHITE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Friday, January 17, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Bow down Thine ear, O Lord, and hear our prayer for Thy name's sake. We thank Thee that neither time nor place can separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

In the spirit of the Teacher of Galilee, we would draw near to Thee and ask that in all things we may put first things first—patience, unity, and consecration to the public weal. Allow us not to indulge in selfishness, with its illusion of gain, but in the goodness and stability of our Republic. We pray for decisions to come through with wisdom and skill. Make us all susceptible to helpful influences, born in deep conviction, in the spirit of fairness, and away from those dreams that dazzle for a day. Arouse within us the ambition, in public service, to be led and directed by Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 14, 1947, was read and approved.

BRITISH LOAN AGREEMENT

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, the newspapers of the last few days have carried several startling stories about an apparent direct violation of the British loan agreement by Great Britain in its trade pact with Argentina a few months ago.

In order that the Members of Congress and the people may know the full facts about this situation, I am today writing Secretary of the Treasury John Snyder for complete copies of his correspondence with Hugh Dalton, Chancelor of the British Exchequer, on this development.

It is obvious that the House of Representatives has a continuing responsibility in this matter.

Eight hundred million dollars has already been advanced under the British loan agreement. Until full information has become available to the House, it is impossible to indicate whether action on the part of the House will be necessary.

REDUCING FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I listened with serious attention to the Budget message of the very able chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from New York, JOHN TABER, who has been in the Congress, I understand, for 23 years; a hard, conscientious worker who has turned in a magnificent performance. I am willing to take the recommendations of a man of his experience and judgment after 23 years on the Appropriations Committee.

I want to assure him, as I believe other Members of the House should, that I stand with him for a balanced budget, a reduction in governmental expenditures, and a substantial yearly reduction of the national debt.

I agree with the distinguished gentleman from New York that the Budget should be no greater than $30,000,000,000. We should apply about $3,000,000,000 each year of savings effected to the reduction of the national debt.

We all should insist upon and demand economy in Government and the elimination of unnecessary bureaus and departments, a reduction of the Federal pay roll, and I also might add that it is about time we take about 1,000,000 payrollers out of the lush pasture of political patronage and off the backs of the American taxpayers. Now is the time to call a halt to excessive Federal spending, and the Appropriations Committee can do exactly that.

I believe that the Members of Congress should wholeheartedly support the position of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and assure him that we agree with and will support his position that the Budget should not be greater than $30,000,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, January 20, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and any other special orders that may have been heretofore agreed upon, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes on the subject, Is It Wise To Cut Income Taxes Now?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the business of the day and any other special orders that may have been heretofore entered, the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] may address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] had a special order for today. I ask unanimous consent that that be transferred to Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PROGRAM FOR WEEK OF JANUARY 20, 1947

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to ask the majority leader what the program for next week will be.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the majority leader is in position to tell us what the program for next week is going to be, we, on this side, would appreciate his telling us. I may say, however, that I would not be disappointed if there were none.

Mr. HALLECK. As the gentleman from Texas understands, we have just now completed the assignments to committees. It is expected they will be getting organized and ready to consider such matters as may come before them.

So far as I know, there are no legislative matters for consideration next week. A number of Members on our side wish to address the House. I am hoping that we can arrive at some determination as to the days on which we shall meet next week in order to permit individual Members to take care of pressing matters in their offices, and also to permit the committees to perfect their organization and otherwise get under way.

Mr. RAYBURN. I thank the gentleman from Indiana.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute; and I also ask unanimous consent to include an address by the Reverend Henry Knox Sherrill, who has just been made presiding bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday at the Washington Cathedral, it was my great privilege to witness the installation, as presiding bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, of my bishop of Massachusetts, the Right Reverend Henry Knox Sherrill. It was one of the most inspiring ceremonies I have ever witnessed. That great cathedral was filled to overflowing. Five hundred clergy were in the choir, clergymen of every denomination, and the congregation packed the building. It was an inspiration to witness the deep fervor with which the entire assemblage sang the religious songs and took part in the religious exercises. Such a thing is of great national importance; indeed, of world-wide importance. It was almost like a revival of religion, which is sorely needed today. Bishop Sherrill is a profoundly religious man and a great leader. His address follows:

In a very few words I express my appreciation of the trust which has been placed in my hands and my gratitude for the generous kindness of many friends. My reticence is due to no lack of personal feeling, but in these times no life is of great significance, especially when this happens to be your own. It is the cause to which we are all committed which is of supreme importance. Nor shall I at this time attempt to suggest any detailed program for the church or the national council. Such plans demand careful study and certainly more knowledge than I have at present. Furthermore, while programs are essential, they are entirely theoretical unless there is a consecrated and convinced membership of the church eager to translate strategy on paper into determined action in life. It is therefore of the temper and mind of the church of which I would speak. My remarks are directed to you not so much as a normal congregation but as representatives of the entire membership of our communion, hundreds of thousands of men, women, boys and girls, clergy and laity scattered throughout the world. While I am thinking especially of our own household of faith, what I have to say is applicable to every Christian communion. Whatever our differences in faith and order may be, we all live in the same world, sharing great truths, and facing the same responsibilities and opportunities.

Certainly, no true Christian can be complacent today either about the state of the world, the church, or himself. Such a statement would seem to be superfluous, were it not that so many of us are apparently content to move along the same conventional routines and paths. What do we need to see before we are stirred to face realities? Twice within our generation so-called Christian nations have engaged in the most devastating and cruel of wars which have involved not alone the fighting forces but entire civilian populations from the aged to infants in untold suffering and privation. We live in a world not only of starvation and want, but, more dangerous even, of suspicion and of hatred. With new and terrifying weapons of destruction, without a new understanding and spirit, man stands on the verge of not divine but self-destruction; this on the word not of the preacher but of the scientist and of the military leader. Nor can we in our own country rest back on self-righteousness. Democracy is a great ideal, but it must work. War, with the pressure of common necessity, brings cooperation and united sacrificial effort. When that pressure is removed, we revert to selfish aims and objectives. There are evidences of ugly racial and religious intolerance. The divorce rate goes up alarmingly. Out of broken homes comes the widespread problem of juvenile delinquency. Deeper than all of these outward signs is to be found a growing spirit of secularization evident in the atmosphere of our homes, our schools and colleges, our personal lives. These are not the opinions of a prophet of pessimism and of doom. These are stern and hard facts well known to us all. I recount them here for one purpose: to emphasize as strongly as possible that we of the church face an heroic and tremendous struggle in the name of Christ. Let us have done with easygoing, thoughtless complacency.

This struggle would be severe were even the entire membership of all the churches of Christ on the firing line. When we stop to examine the facts, we find that in every parish and diocese it is largely the few who bear the burden and heat of the day. It is as if an army were engaged in a life-and-death struggle, with a large proportion of the soldiers busied in some other activity or else taking the position of spectators or neutrals. The churches are at a tremendous disadvantage, for we are in essence waging a desperate spiritual warfare in a most critical period of history, at the same time carrying a vast weight of nominal Christians who, as someone has remarked, having been once inoculated by weak religion, seem to be impervious to the real thing. Dean Hodges, late dean of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass., used to say that the task of the church is to make the indifferent different. We must begin to do this within our own ecclesiastical family.

I wish to make it entirely clear that I am in no way faulting the faithful here or elsewhere, and least of all am I reading any group out of the church, for we are, all of us, fallible human beings. But I do feel that the times call us to be more clear cut, to examine more critically our own beliefs and practices and, more particularly, our own personal sincerity and loyalty.

The faith of the Christian is complex, and yet in essence is extremely simple. We see in and through and behind creation, as well as in history, the will and purpose of an eternal and living God. We look at Jesus of Nazareth, living in the limitation of space of time and of human form, and we believe that the Word became flesh and dwelt among us—that in Him we find the way and the truth. "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." We have faith that God does not dwell in some far-distant heaven but that His Holy Spirit is at work in the world, especially in those who have given themselves to God in the fellowship of faithful people in the church.

These are such familiar statements to Christians that they have ceased to have startling news value. But there we are wrong; if they are true there is nothing possibly in all the world of greater significance. If there be a God revealed to us so personally in Christ, if Christ has shown to us the divine pattern for our lives, if there is in Christ the power to make us become the sons of God, then here is the news to make all other affirmations of any character whatsoever insignificant. If these statements be not true, then no one of us should wish to make any pretense of either believing or of acting upon them. Here is too serious a matter for trifling, or for mere lip service. The point is that the members of our church do say that they believe. We join in the words of the creed: "I believe in God, I believe in Jesus Christ His only Son, I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Holy Catholic Church." Many thousands of our people have stood in the chancel of some church and have solemnly of their own will pledged themselves to follow Jesus Christ as their Lord and Saviour. It is now time to ask ourselves what we mean by these words and by these acts. No one asks for perfection. We all are weak and we constantly fail. That is why there are confessions of sin in our liturgy. But we do have a right to expect of ourselves and of others an underlying sincerity of effort and the realization of the greatness of our commitment.

If we truly believe in God in Christ, then worship becomes no conventional act of outward respectability, but the very bread of life through prayer and sacrament. If we truly believe, then brotherhood becomes more than a slogan; it is a conviction that we belong, all of us of every nation and race, to the family of God. Selfishness, intolerance, hatred give place to the compulsion of love. If we really believe, then Christian discipleship, the mission of the church are not inconsequential asides or the task of peculiar people. They are the absorbing responsibility and opportunity of every member of the church. In one of the most popular of missionary hymns, joined in lustily by every congregation, we sing, "Give of thy sons to bear the message glorious; give of thy wealth to send them on their way, pour out thy soul for them in prayer victorious; till God shall bring His kingdom's glorious day." Are these mere words? If so they are shocking in their insincerity. If they are meant, then there is demanded and implied a consecration of life and of our means.

I am not naive enough to believe that the solution of our present difficult problems is easy or simple. I know full well the complexities of our world. But I am convinced that these questions, whether of international conferences, of industry, of labor, of the home, of education, or of human relationships can only be given satisfactory and definite answer by the standard of the mind and spirit of Him we call our Lord and Master. But before we can dare to apply Christ's teaching to the world, we must meet Him in our own minds, wills, and hearts. The world must find evidence of the presence of Christ in the membership of the Christian church. "If the salt have lost its savor wherewithal shall it be salted?" "If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness." The first task is to see that we and all who are of the church are Christian.

The American people have on the whole seen the importance of education and of health. We have thought of these causes rightly in large terms of millions upon millions of dollars, with the enlistment of a personnel of remarkable ability. I mention this only in contrast to the small way we have envisaged the work of the church, in terms of both money and workers clerical and lay. Similarly, we talk much of democracy in world terms. Democracy emphasizes the worth and the value of the individual. But apart from a faith in God, of what eternal significance is personality? Apart from human souls, what incentive is there to care passionately for human minds and bodies? In the faith of the Christian is to be found the inspiration of the finest and best in our civilization. It is time that we think of the church in large terms of intelligence, interest, and support. For if the Christian Evangel be true, here is the greatest of all causes given by God into the hands of men. Upon this rests all other efforts for the attainment of peace and of righteousness.

If there are stern realities to be faced courageously and realistically, it is equally true that there are firm grounds for encouragement. Never before has the cause of Christian missions been so justified by the march of events. It is not so long ago that the Christian who talked of the family of nations, of human brotherhood, of the world community of interest was considered to be an impracticable dreamer. Now we know that such a Christian talked hard common sense. The organization of the United Nations, the proposals for World Government, every peace conference of the leaders of the nations, indeed every newspaper headline prove the essential correctness of the Christian view of the world and human nature. With the advent of modern methods of communication and of transportation we have an unprecedented means and opportunity of telling the good news, not of our western civilization, but of the Christ who would draw all men unto Him.

Furthermore, we can rejoice that not in many centuries has there been evident such a spirit of cooperation among the many of the great communions of the Christian Church as shown in programs of vital importance. I am happy to emphasize a resolution passed overwhelmingly by both houses of our general convention as indication of the mind of our own church:

"Resolved, That this general convention herewith goes on record as expressing its sincere intention to seek closer cooperation and joint action with other churches and with the Federal Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches in facing together in the light of our Christian faith, the material, moral, and spiritual issues of our day."

If the Christian forces of the world can stand together for Christian truth and practice, then there is reason for the conviction that the powers of evil can be overcome.

But of course the great reason for realistic and determined confidence is in the character of our faith. If to the best of our ability, we are true and loyal, then we work not in our own feeble human strength but as living channels of the power of God in Jesus Christ. Like the servant of old, if we have the eyes of faith we shall know that "around and about us are the horses and chariots of fire," that "they who are with us are more than they that be with them."

So as this month, by the act of the general convention, I assume a position of leadership within the church, I ask of every bishop, clergyman, layman, and laywoman: "Where do we stand? What do you believe? What do you plan to give of your means, above all of your life, in this cause?" If you are not deeply concerned, then let us know that and have it settled where we stand and upon whom we can count. Again I say let each of us throughout the church face again the overwhelming implications of the Christian faith and his own sincerity in affirming that faith.

Numbers are important, but not vital. The essential things are consecration, determination, loyalty, the character of the Christian community that God may use us as instruments of His purpose and will. Here today, as representatives of all our people, in humility, in trust, in thankfulness for all that God has given to us, we rededicate ourselves, our souls, and bodies.

GREAT BRITAIN'S PACT WITH ARGENTINA

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, as one who voted against the British loan, I note that Britain's trade pact with Argentina provides that in case Argentina has an unfavorable trade balance it can draw on its bloc sterling account, but this money must be spent in the sterling area. This is a violation of Britain's pledge to dissipate the sterling bloc pool within 1 year from the date of the agreement.

Britain intimates that the Argentine violation will not be repeated in other trade agreements. I doubt this.

Furthermore, Britain has done little to settle India's large sterling balances which are upward of £1,300,000,000. Britain owes other sterling areas billions more. We were unwilling to become a new creditor to the extent of three and three-quarter billions without definite assurances that other creditors of Britain would scale down their credits. Again Britain is unfair.

REDUCTION OF INCOME TAX

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, my bill, H. R. 575, seeks to raise the yearly income-tax exemption of single persons to $2,500 and to increase the tax exemption of married persons to $5,000.

This bill was drafted and introduced by me because I sincerely believe that it will give much needed relief to our farmers, veterans, small businessmen, white-collar employees, and the laboring men and women of the country. In other words, it will definitely raise the income of the "little fellow" in that he will have more "Saturday-night rattling change" after present high-cost living expenses and taxes have been met.

Compare my bill with the flat 20 percent tax-reduction bill which has been introduced. This bill is calculated to save money for the rich man. For instance, it is estimated that the "little fellow" who makes a net yearly income of $2,000 would have a savings of only $38 per annum or about 70 cents a week, while the person with an income of $250,000 would save over $38,000 yearly, or around $730 per week.

It may be argued by those who see fit to oppose my bill that it will cost the Treasury, in the loss of income taxes, some $6,000,000,000 per year, and that such would keep the Budget in the red. However, I contend that, although the Government may lose this sum of money in the form of income taxes from our "little fellow," nevertheless the Treasury will receive a like or similar amount of money through the medium of excise taxes. In other words, my plan would only shift the burden of taxation from income tax to the excise tax, insofar as the small wage earner is concerned.

The individual who now earns less than $5,000 per year must, through necessity, spend the bulk of it. By allowing him this income-tax exemption, we would leave him more "defrosted cash" on pay day, hence, more money to spend. As a result, he would drive his automobile more frequently, buy more gasoline, oil, tires, and tubes. Each time he would make a purchase of any of these items, he would pay a Federal excise tax. Likewise, he would be in a position to buy more tobacco, furs, and jewelry. He would make more long-distance calls, send more telegrams, go to more movies, see more ball games, and actually be in a position to take the "little missus" to a dance now and then. All of this would swell the excise taxes to such an extent that little would be lost through the medium of the raise in the income-tax exemption.

It is my belief that by giving this income-tax relief to Mr. and Mrs. Average American, our entire economic structure will be strengthened because it will enable the little fellow to pay his debts and to be able to spend, all of which will put more money in circulation, create more buying power and, in the final analysis, return a like or similar amount of Federal revenue into the Treasury through excise taxes in lieu of income taxes.

In this manner, our Federal Budget would not be tipped out of balance, because by retaining our luxury taxes for a reasonable length of time, the tremendous appropriations now required by our armed forces would not be jeopardized.

Let us balance the budget of little John Q. Taxpayer and he will balance our Federal Budget.

VETERAN AMPUTEES

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, one of the programs adopted by the Seventy-ninth Congress—which I believe was most successful—was the appropriation of $30,000,000 in order that men who had lost one leg at the ankle, and who had suffered perhaps further injuries, could receive automobiles at the expense of the Government. Recently two men who had lost legs came to my office in Springfield, Mass., and told me that they appreciated greatly the fact that they had these automobiles. It has given them a chance to get around and to earn a livelihood and has built up their morale greatly. Similarly this past week a mother came to my office and told me that her son had one such automobile and that in her opinion the gift of this automobile by the United States Government was the greatest morale builder which the Congress had given to the veterans in any legislation. Also during this same time two other boys, and they were boys although one of them weighed over 200 pounds, came into my office. Each wore an artificial arm. Each of them asked me why they had been discriminated against. One of them had been a truck driver. He said that if he had an automobile with the contrivances to permit him to drive it, having lost one arm and having an artificial arm, he felt that he could earn a livelihood which he was otherwise deprived from doing. So, in order that these men may have the opportunity to go ahead just as the men who have lost their legs, I am introducing a bill today to give to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs authority to purchase automobiles for men who have lost at least one arm at the wrist. I hope it will receive your prompt, careful, and favorable consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and to include excerpts from the financial report of Anderson, Clayton & Co. for 1936.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, there are two very timely reasons why I must discuss the United States Department of State at this time.

First. Gen. George C. Marshall, for whom we all have the highest admiration, soon will take office as the new Secretary of State, and, therefore, will be presented a first-rate opportunity to "clean house" of the Communists, "one-worlders," and multimillionaire playboy diplomats who have been using American funds indirectly to increase their family fortunes.

Second. Conferences are being held this week relating to further extension of the reciprocal trade agreements.

Presumably, the Department of State is listening to the pleas of more American industries before it cuts the economic ground from under a new group of American employers and employees. One of the men in the Department of State who is taking a leading hand in these deliberations and will have a great deal to say about any final agreements is William Lockhart Clayton, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs. Mr. Clayton is a well-known "one-worlder" in "do-gooder" circles, and I must admit that he does believe in one world—one world for Will Clayton and family.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot about war contractors and Congressmen in recent months, and it was well that the American people learned these facts which were made public. It helped in bringing about the present Republican majority in both Houses of Congress, for the Congressmen who now are in the majority on the Republican side did not move across the aisle. They were sent across the aisle by the American people.

Now, of course, the American people want us to let them in on some more secrets of this swollen bureaucracy that is Washington. They want us to throw back the iron curtain which the New Deal has kept firmly between the public and the activities of high Government officials during the years when our money was being thrown to the four winds for every kind of foolishness and fol-de-rol it was possible for the mind of man to conjure.

Let me just give the American people a little data about Will Clayton—the man who is in charge of the reciprocal trade-agreement program for the Department of State. Then, I am sure, they and other Congressmen will join with me in calling on incoming Secretary of State Marshall to get rid of Mr. Clayton and others who have been posing as pious, public-spirited servants of the people while making exorbitant profits by reason of their high places.

Mr. Clayton, if there are any who do not know it already, is always in favor of foreign loans. He made the first announcement in 1945 that the British were seeking a three- or four-billion-dollar loan and it was he who opened the preliminary discussions in London. He was the principal negotiator of the three and three-fourths billion-dollar British gift-loan which a Democratic Congress passed and a Democratic President signed. Now, Mr. Clayton also is something else besides the Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs. He is the principal shareholder in Anderson, Clayton & Co., the largest cotton firm in the world.

He and members of his immediate family jointly own 40 percent of the stock in this company. When he came to Washington to join the New Deal in 1940, he resigned as president of this company, but he did not divest himself or members of his family of their huge stockholding in a company that depends for its very livelihood on foreign dealings—and, to a large extent, on the decisions made by Will Clayton.

I hold in my hand a copy of the last annual report of this company and its consolidated subsidiaries. This report, dated October 21, 1946, and for the fiscal year ending July 31, 1946, reveals that the company made a total net profit of $14,138,877 after taxes. Of that amount, more than $5,500,000 went to Under Secretary of State Will Clayton and his wife and children, who own 40 percent of the stock.

The record earnings, it is clear, were made in the year in which Great Britain was given a three and three-quarter billion American dollar loan. Remember, that loan was negotiated principally by and through Will Clayton.

Without American dollars, Great Britain would be unable to make large cotton or other purchases in this country.

As we all know, Mr. Clayton is an active propagandist for more loans to other nations—to China, to France, to the Netherlands, and to Italy. His reasons are that these nations need more American dollars to buy more raw materials—including cotton.

But a study of his record and his words, Mr. Speaker, does not show that he is interested primarily in American cotton or the American cotton farmer. On the contrary, Mr. Clayton's company depends on cotton from other nations as part of its huge volume of trade. It can be shown that this company, headed until recently by Will Clayton and still controlled by him indirectly through his ownership of stock and friendship ties, actually has hurt the American cotton farmer—perhaps fatally.

This company was active in helping promote the growth of cotton in Brazil. Before World War II, Brazil cotton production reached a peak of several hundred thousand bales annually. It is predicted now that Brazil soon will be producing millions of bales annually. Other countries are competing with our cotton farmer for his world market—Russia, and Egypt for two examples.

But does Will Clayton care if American cotton production falls year by year and foreign production increases? Not in the least, for his company does not care where cotton is grown as long as it can handle the sales. Its profit lies not in adding to the wealth of the world through producing cotton, but in handling that white gold wherever it is grown. He is for a greater volume of cotton trading, no matter how much it costs the American taxpayer in loans or the American cotton farmer in lost markets, because Mr. Clayton's profits depend upon volume of sales.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you and to the Members of this Congress that Mr. Clayton's presence in his high State Department post is as much a reflection on the executive branch of this Government as the presence of any Senator or Representative accused of accepting favors from war contractors is a blot on the Senate or the House. I make the statement that he has to have as little moral sensibility as any other money changer to sit in a high public post and advocate policies by the American Government year after year that directly and definitely and without doubt enrich his own family coffers. If he has any idea of responsibility left, after making all his millions by misusing American tax money, I call on Mr. Clayton to exercise it and to resign from the Department of State.

Let me read some statements from this annual report of the Anderson, Clayton & Co. to show how closely its profits are tied into the policies of the Federal Government. Then, I challenge anyone to explain the difference between Mr. Clayton's activities and those of some rather notorious characters on Capitol Hill who lately have been run through the mill by the Nation's editorial writers and their fellow Congressmen.

On the first page of the report to stockholders we see this statement:

Export sales were facilitated by the Government export subsidy of 4 cents per pound and by Export-Import Bank credits to foreign countries for the importation of United States cotton.

A little further on we read:

Satisfactory progress has been made in the reestablishment of the company's sales agencies in China, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Sweden, and Switzerland, all of which are in active operation and contributed importantly to profitable sales during the year. The agencies in England, France, Spain, Norway, and Finland are intact, but their scopes are limited by the continuance of centralized Government purchase of cotton in those countries.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that Will Clayton will see to it that some more officials of his company in those countries where the governments are interfering will worm their way into important Government posts and rectify the situation.

I continue quoting from this financial report:

The company has made sales to the central buying agencies of these five countries and Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Speaker, Will Clayton came to Washington in 1940 as an official of the Export-Import Bank, which is concerned primarily with the promotion of foreign trade, and later he served as Surplus Property Administrator. But this latter post offered him no opportunity to promote his own self-interest well enough, so through wielding his enormous funds and his enormous influence in places where they counted for most, he was able to become Under Secretary of State.

But Mr. Speaker, Mr. Clayton is not the only advocate of increased foreign loans, more reciprocal-trade agreements, and general one-world policies in the Department of State. It is honeycombed with men who think more of the almighty dollar than they think of their duty to the millions of working men and women who are the backbone of this Nation and whose taxes have been ladled out in vain efforts to lift up other nations. These efforts have succeeded only in impoverishing America, raising prices here and enriching those who played a big part in making the ladling possible. I am not talking about $25,000 bribes, or $1,000 bribes, I am talking about open, flagrant advocating of policies and practices that brought millions of dollars into the pockets of those in the executive branch of the Government.

There is another Under Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. He is not officially in charge of economic affairs, but you can be sure that he is seeing to it that he is not personally left out of any economic affairs that are going on. I refer to Dean Acheson, beneath whose voice of idealism you can detect the rasp of the money changer.

Acheson, it will be recalled by all who read the newspapers, is another man who is always speaking for foreign loans. He favored every loan I ever heard proposed, and likely he is in favor of a whole raft of loans that are yet to be proposed. And, of course, he is there nodding his head when any suggestion is made by Will Clayton to reduce the American tariff further and thus to wipe out another American industry or two.

Mr. Acheson, when he is not passing out America's millions in loans, is a member of the Washington law firm of Covington, Burling & Rublee, one of the wealthiest and largest in the Nation. Acheson himself has done well enough through his partnership in the firm to maintain two very nice homes, but whether he calls them Dream House No. 1, or Dream House No. 2, I cannot say.

I hold in my hand a copy of the New Leader, one of the most respected anti-Soviet and proliberal magazines published in the United States. On the front page of this copy, dated January 4, 1947, there is a very interesting article relating to Mr. Acheson and the members of his law firm, all of whom undoubtedly work together closely, although Mr. Acheson has to stay busy at the State Department issuing idealistic statements.

This article in the New Leader states that, at this moment, a member of Acheson's law firm is actively trying to help Poland to extract a $500,000,000 loan from the American Government. This lawyer-partner of Acheson is reputed to be Donald Hiss, formerly chief economic adviser to Acheson in the State Department before he took off his mask and actively became a member of Acheson's law firm. The fee, if the loan goes through, is supposed to be $1,000,000. That, of course, is short cotton compared to the long staple that Will Clayton gets, but it makes an appreciably large green bale when you put it all together.

Donald Hiss has for several years been associated with a pro-Soviet group in Washington whose directing genius has been Lee Pressman, now chief counsel of the CIO—

According to this New Leader article:

Another member of this group was Donald's brother, Alger Hiss. It was this association which resulted in Alger Hiss' resignation under doubtful circumstances from the Department of Agriculture in 1935. Later, Alger Hiss also turned up in the State Department, and also as an economic adviser. With the backing and friendship of Harry Hopkins, chief architect of the State Department's Soviet appeasement policy, Alger Hiss became secretary-general of the San Francisco United Nations Conference. Recently Alger Hiss left the State Department to become president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Mr. Speaker, my feelings for the late President Roosevelt are well known. I thought he was mistaken on many points, and I want to mention another point on which I have just discovered that he was mistaken. Henry Morgenthau, the former Secretary of the Treasury, relates in his voluminous diary that Franklin Roosevelt once termed Dean Acheson a "lightweight." This was interpreted by Morgenthau as being a gentle hint to get rid of Acheson, who then was an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, so Acheson left that post shortly thereafter. My research proves to me that Mr. Acheson is not a "lightweight." It shows clearly that, along with the other great financial wizards of the New Deal, he has learned well how to feather his own nest while serving in a public post. He can now practice law and hold his official post at the same time. He can even say to himself that he is obeying the Biblical injunction not to let his right hand know what his left hand is doing.

Mr. Speaker, I planned to introduce a resolution to investigate these men who have so much to say about where our American tax money is going. But in view of the elevation of General Marshall to the post of Secretary of State, I am withholding that resolution to see if he will not clean house of these men who are using public posts for private gains. I am hoping against hope that integrity can be restored to the executive branch of the Government by an aroused public, just as we know it has been restored to other branches of the Government in days past by the same aroused public.

SOIL CONSERVATION YEAR

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, the year 1947 should be conservation year. The Nation has just emerged from the most destructive war in all history, with its resources depleted and energies dissipated. This is especially the case with reference to the soil. Intensive cultivation over a period of several years for the purpose of producing record wartime food crops, without the compensating soil restoring and erosion-control practices, has taken much of the vitality and fertility out of the ground. I therefore propose that 1947 be known as soil conservation year and, during this time, we place special emphasis upon all methods of rebuilding and restoring our most fundamental of all assets—the soil. I hope this Congress and the President will see fit to accept this recommendation and the people of this Nation to place it into practical execution.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHAFER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article on soil conservation appearing in the Country Gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. COLE of New York (at the request of Mr. HALLECK) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article by David Lawrence.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE MAKING OF A CONGRESSMAN—A 1947 REVISION

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, on the 5th of June 1930 the Honorable Guy U. Hardy, who had been for 14 years a Representative from Colorado, inserted in the RECORD, for the benefit of Members of Congress and the general public, a compilation of information which was one of the most valuable contributions ever made. He entitled it "Many Questions That Many Ask About the Congress, Its Works and Ways, Are Here Answered."

Since that date other contributions have been made based on Representative Hardy's original, none of which has contained all of the subject matter, and none of which has entirely brought up to date the information contained therein.

Both the Honorable Arthur P. Lamneck, a Representative from Ohio in the Seventy-second through the Seventy-fifth Congresses, and I have undertaken at one time or another to use a part of the material.

When Mr. Hardy spoke in the House on the works and ways of the Congress he started something, the value of which is evidenced by the demand, then, for reprints of his address and, later, for copies of my own speech, The Making of a Congressman, made in the Seventy-sixth Congress, on February 24, 1939, and based largely on his earlier contribution which I endeavored to revise and to extend along certain informative lines.

The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946—Public Law 601 of the Seventy-ninth Congress—which embodies the recommendations of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress, necessarily makes obsolete or incorrect some of the information contained in the original and in the 1940 revision of "The Making of a Congressman."

Since, as I say, I have had over the years a great many requests for copies and since the demand continues even today, I feel the speech should be brought up to date. Therefore, at the request of many Representatives, I have attempted to correct and extend the speech I made.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I submit this 1947 revision.

On the 27th day of February, 1882, the then Senator James G. Blaine, of Maine, delivered a memorial oration before the two Houses in commemoration of the life and death of President James A. Garfield. In the course of his oration Senator Blaine said:

> There is no test of a man's ability in any department of public life more severe than service in the House of Representatives; there is no place where so little deference is paid to reputation previously acquired, or to eminence won outside; no place where so little consideration is shown for the feelings or the failures of beginners. What a man gains in the House he gains by sheer force of his own character, and if he loses and falls back he must expect no mercy, and will receive no sympathy. It is a field in which the survival of the strongest is the recognized rule, and where no pretense can deceive and no glamor can mislead. The real man is discovered, his worth is impartially weighed, his rank is irreversibly decreed.

The truth of the above statement is just as obvious to all of us who sit in this Chamber today and observe its inexorable demonstration as it was 65 years ago.

"The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they grind exceedingly small" might well be a text for a sermon to those who in any session of Congress attempt the rapids before they have learned to swim.

How, then, may a newly elected Representative fit himself for efficient service and the discharge of his duties? This is an ever recurring question with which all of us are confronted. So it may not be out of place, and I hope may not be considered presumptuous, Mr. Speaker, if, with a due appreciation of my own limitation, I undertake to pass on to others some of the answers, counsel, and advice so generously given by those older and more experienced in service to whom we have turned for such counsel as has helped us to steer past whirlpools wherein we most surely would have at least capsized and has saved us from many prospective bumps and bruises and made life bearable for us.

One of the wiser and more farseeing of my friends advised me to familiarize myself with Lewis Deschler's Jefferson's Manual and Rules of the House of Representatives.

Says House Parliamentarian Deschler:

> From the beginning of the first Congress, the House has formulated rules for its procedure. Some of them have since gone out of existence. More of them have been amplified and broadened to meet the exigencies that have arisen from time to time. Today they are perhaps the most finely adjusted, scientifically balanced, and highly technical rules of any parliamentary body of the world. Under them a majority may work its will at all times in the face of the most determined and vigorous opposition of a minority. * * *
> I believe that I am not making too broad a statement when I say that the parliamentary practice of the House is a system of procedure that ranks second to none. It has proven adequate to meet all the emergencies that have arisen in the past. It will meet the emergencies and problems of the future with the same degree of success.

Having done that, my friend advised me to study Representative CLARENCE CANNON's Procedure in the House of Representatives.

CLARENCE CANNON, as you know, is our colleague, the distinguished Representative from the State of Missouri, former Parliamentarian of the House and long the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations. In the foreword to his work, he says:

> The time of the House is too valuable, the scope of its enactments too far-reaching, and the constantly increasing pressure of its business too great to justify lengthy and perhaps acrimonious discussion of questions of procedure which have been authoritatively decided in former sessions.
> The purpose of this book is to provide a synopsis of the procedure of the House for use on the floor where the authorities and sources, because of their bulk and diversity, are not always immediately available. While comprehensiveness and detail have been sacrificed to brevity and accessibility, no notable decision has been omitted, and each topic is, for practical purposes, a complete résumé of the procedure on that subject.

Having studied these, it was suggested then that I make it my business to attend the sessions of the House regularly in order to learn by observation and assimilation the application of the rules and how the House operates thereunder.

Then one man of long years of service said to me:

> PLUMLEY, you will never know what it is all about and why unless and until you read Legislative Procedure, Legislative Assemblies, Legislative Principles, and Legislative Problems, four recognized works of authority written by Robert Luce, the eminent parliamentary authority from Massachusetts.

In Legislative Procedure, Mr. Luce states:

> Lawmakers must themselves be governed by law, else they would in confusion worse confounded quickly come to grief.
> It is true that with Coke and Blackstone and Kent we do not ordinarily class Hatsell and Hinds. It is true that the literature of parliamentary law is scanty and that it deals with minutiae of seemingly little consequence to human rights. Yet think what the law and the practice of legislative assemblies really mean. They make it possible under a representative form of government for the will of the people to be ascertained. Starting with the assumption that this will is the will of the majority, we can give it expression and effect only by processes that at the same time endow it with form and win submission by the minority. Lacking either achievement, chaos follows.

Again he says:

> Herein lies the safety of the minority, and this it is that makes parliamentary law and procedure of the greatest consequence to the public safety. Government survives because the lesser part yields to the greater part. Teutonic peoples have had more success than others in self-government because with them the minority, however convinced of its own wisdom, consents to be ruled by the majority until in orderly fashion the minority can make itself the majority. The minority insists on only the right to be heard. Theirs is the cry of Themistocles to Euripides, "Strike, but hear me!" Give them but the chance to present their arguments fairly, fully, and they will abide the issue. This is what we call liberty, though just why it would be hard to tell. * * *
> Thomas Jefferson took the same view. Referring to Hatsell in the introductory words of his Manual, he recalled that Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say: "It was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration, and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons, than a neglect of, or departure from, the rules of proceeding; that these forms, as instituted by your ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were in many instances a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempts of power." So far, said Jefferson, the maxim is certainly true and is founded in good sense, that as it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary from time to time and are become the law of the House; by a strict adherence to which only the weaker party can be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

I commend the foregoing references to your careful consideration, and I also suggest a thorough study of the provisions of Public Law No. 601, the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

And now we come to the practical proposition which has confronted us all, as to the source of information with respect to our daily duties, and as to where we can get information, and from whom, and what shall we do next.

With certain deletions, therefore, and with several additions of my own, I now offer for your consideration the Hardy original brought down to date:

WHAT IS CONGRESS?

Congress is the legislative body of the United States Government. The functions of the National Government are divided into three parts: Executive, judicial, and legislative. States have their State legislatures. Cities have their city councils. The Nation has its Congress. Its existence, authority, and limitations are provided by the Constitution. Article I, section 1, reads:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

HOW LONG HAVE WE HAD A CONGRESS?

The First Congress met 158 years ago, on March 4, 1789, in New York City, where the first and second sessions were held; subsequently, including the first session of the Sixth Congress, Philadelphia was the meeting place; since then Congress has convened in Washington, D. C.

The earlier Continental Congress, 1774–89, to be sure, had various places of meeting and included Philadelphia; Baltimore; Lancaster, Pa.; York, Pa.; Princeton, N. J.; Annapolis, Md.; Trenton, N. J.; and New York City.

Incidentally, the President is authorized by proclamation to convene Congress at such place other than Washington as he may judge proper when "from the prevalence of contagious sickness, or the existence of other circumstances, it would, in the opinion of the President, be hazardous to the lives or health of the Members to meet" in Washington.

WHEN DOES CONGRESS MEET?

The Constitution, article I, section 4, provides that—

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year * * * on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Pursuant to a resolution of the Continental Congress, the first session of the First Congress convened March 4, 1789; up to and including May 20, 1820, 18 acts were passed providing for the meeting of Congress on other days in the year. Since that year Congress met regularly on the first Monday in December until 1934, when the twentieth amendment to the Constitution became effective, changing the meeting of Congress to January 3, unless the Congress shall, by law, appoint a different date.

The general elections held in the fall of every even year determine the composition of the House membership for the ensuing 2 years with the Members-elect subscribing to the oath of office and being inducted into office in the January following.

WHAT IS A CONGRESSMAN?

Strictly speaking, a Member of either the Senate or the House of Representatives is a Congressman. However, in general practice we speak of a Member of the Senate as a Senator and of a Member of the House as a Congressman, although the official title of the latter is Representative in Congress.

HOW MANY MEMBERS?

There are 96 United States Senators, 2 from each of the 48 States in the Union.

There are 435 Members of the House of Representatives, each State being entitled to the number its population justifies. The Member or Members of the House to which each State is entitled is determined on the basis of the decennial census. There are two methods under existing law which may be followed in making the apportionment; one method is known as that of "major fractions," and the other is known as "the method of equal proportions." Under no circumstances shall any State have less than one Member.

While Congress, by law, apportions the number of Representatives to each State, the State legislatures establish the districts from which the selection shall be made.

In addition to the Members of the House from the various States, Alaska and Hawaii each have Delegates, and Puerto Rico has a Resident Commissioner. The Delegates and Resident Commissioner have the right of debate but have no vote upon legislation appearing before the House for action.

WHAT QUALIFICATIONS ARE REQUIRED FOR MEMBERSHIP?

The Constitution provides that a Member of the House of Representatives must have attained the age of 25, have been a citizen of the United States for 7 years, and be an inhabitant of the State in which he is elected. In practice he is usually a resident of the district which he represents, but that is not a constitutional requirement. A United States Senator must have attained the age of 30 years, have been a citizen of the United States for 9 years, and be an inhabitant of the State which elects him.

WHAT OATH DO MEMBERS TAKE?

The oath of office taken by the Members of the House is administered by the Speaker, and by the Vice President to the Senators. It reads:

I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me, God.

The Constitution provides that the President of the United States, Senators, Representatives, members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution.

WHAT ABOUT EXTRA SESSIONS?

The President may call the Congress to meet in extraordinary session at any time he thinks the interests of the country justify it.

There has been only one four-session Congress, the Sixty-seventh, during President Harding's administration.

The longest session of the Congress was the third session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, from January 3, 1940, through January 3, 1941. The shortest session was the 10-day session called by President Pierce to enact an Army appropriation measure in 1856. The Senate, alone, has been called into special session even for 1-day or 2-day sessions, but in such cases it was for the purpose of confirming Presidential appointments; the latter body may be called in extra session, without the House, to consider treaties, try impeachments, and confirm appointments.

HOW ARE VACANCIES FILLED?

Members do die in office, and occasionally one resigns, usually to take what he considers to be a better office, however. When a Senator dies or resigns, the governor of his State may appoint his successor to serve only until an election is held, providing his State legislature has given him the authority. If a Representative dies or resigns, his place cannot be filled by appointment. The governor of his State may call a special election to fill the place, if he desires, or, as is done in many cases, the place may be left vacant until the next general election.

WHAT ARE THE DUTIES OF A MEMBER?

They are many and manifold. He should study legislation and attend the meetings of his House. He should listen to a good deal of the debates, but not all of them by any means. Many Members are kept in committee meetings many hours of many days of every session. The average Member develops a large office business. The Members get a vast amount of mail. This requires much study, dictation of replies, and often visits to different executive departments downtown. The departments are far away and often far apart. Many ex-servicemen bring their problems to their Congressman, and he is always glad to help them out when and wherever he can, although he has not the power always to do as much as he would like.

A Member will get a thousand letters, or maybe several thousand letters, in a session from citizens advocating or opposing proposed legislation. Usually a Congressman answers every letter, though he cannot tell everybody what he thinks about every bill that has been introduced. He must wait developments through committee hearings and give thought to those measures that are being brought forward by favorable committee action.

WHAT ARE THE IMPORTANT COMMITTEES?

The two most important are probably Appropriations and Ways and Means. All bills that relate to the appropriation of money must be considered by and reported out by the Appropriations Committee of the House. This committee consists of 43 members, 25 Republicans and 18 Democrats. It reports out bills that carry appropriations for billions each year.

The Ways and Means Committee has to consider and report out all bills that have in any way to do with raising revenue, tariff, or any sort of taxes. This committee consists of 25 members, 15 Republicans and 10 Democrats. All revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives and come out of the Ways and Means Committee.

There are 19 standing House committees and 15 standing committees in the Senate.

HOW ARE COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS MADE?

The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 provides that—

All vacancies in standing committees in the House shall be filled by election by the House. Each Member shall be elected to serve on one standing committee and no more; except that Members who are elected to serve on the Committee on the District of Columbia or on the Committee on Un-American Activities may be elected to serve on two standing committees and no more, and Members of the majority party who are elected to serve on the Committee on House Administration may be elected to serve on two standing committees and no more.

The act provides, further, that—

Each Senator shall serve on two standing committees and no more, except that Senators of the majority party who are members of the Committee on the District of Columbia or of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments may serve on three standing committees and no more.

In actual practice the selections for committee assignments are made for the Republicans by their Committee on Committees, and for the Democrats by the Democratic Committee on Committees. These selections are then confirmed by election by the House.

As a rule, once on an important committee a member stays there as long as he is in Congress. If a vacancy occurs on an important committee, a member from another committee may be given the place by the Committee on Committees if he desires it, and if he has the seniority and influence to get it. New Members get the places left available.

WHO APPOINTS THE CHAIRMEN OF COMMITTEES?

They are elected by the House. In actual practice, however, the Member of the majority party who has served longest on any committee is selected as chairman. Here seniority plays an important part. The chairmen, of course, all come from the majority party, and the majority of the members of all committees are of the dominant party.

WHAT IS THE COMMITTEE ON RULES?

This is one of the most important committees as it controls the destiny of more proposed legislation than any other. Bills from the Ways and Means and Appropriations Committees have the right-of-way, so to speak, and can always be brought up for consideration. Other committees have only a few calendar days in any one session on which their bills may be brought up. So many bills reported out cannot be brought up for consideration. The Rules Committee can report a rule for consideration of a bill any day. It can bring in a rule for the consideration of any bill that has been reported out of any committee any time. In the last days of a session special rules to bring out special bills are much in demand. The Rules Committee has much power, certainly has the power of selection, but it must be fair and discriminating, selecting what the majority of Congress seems to want most, as the rule it brings in must be adopted by the House.

WHAT IS THE STEERING COMMITTEE?

This is a committee not much heard of nor mentioned in the newspapers. And I dare say that hardly two dozen Members of the House can tell the names of all the members of the steering committee. This is a little party adjunct to help promote legislation the majority is interested in, and to help iron out a program of procedure, especially in the closing days of a session. It is composed of nine of the older majority Members. In addition, the majority leader acts as chairman. When important matters are up for consideration the Speaker and the chairman of the Rules Committee sit in. This committee really has a good deal of influence in helping to shape up the legislative program.

WHAT ARE CONFERENCES AND CONFEREES?

The House passes a bill, for instance. It goes to the Senate and may be much amended over there, as are appropriations and tariff bills usually. The House will not accept the amendments. So the bill is sent to conference. The House appoints three or five Members as conferees and the Senate appoints an equal number. These gentlemen meet and hold a conference and discuss the points in disagreement. The conferees of the Senate give up some items and the conferees of the House agree to some. Finally they get together on a bill somewhere between the position taken by each House. Sometimes the conferees do not give up easily; sometimes the conference drags on for days or weeks, and they have run for months. Usually they get together, and usually the conference report is adopted by both Houses. Which end of the Capitol is the most stubborn? Well, the other end, of course.

WHAT RESEARCH ASSISTANCE IS AVAILABLE TO MEMBERS?

One of the chief reasons for the new legislative reorganization was a growing recognition of the fact that proper and effective functioning of the Congress depends upon adequate preparation, and of the further fact that a Congressman's day, like everyone else's, has just 24 hours.

What is available, then, in the way of time-saving and preparation beyond a Member's own staff? The new Legislative Reorganization Act points up some of the aids, but I would emphasize to you that developments under the new system are matters of degree rather than of kind. Congress did not in 1946 become for the first time aware that it needed expert assistance in the drafting of legislation, or that its committees needed specialists in the fields of their particular interest, or that the resources of the Library of Congress could be of tremendous assistance if adequately interpreted and brought to bear on specific problems. Committees had hired experts before, but on a special-job basis. Congress had set up for itself a drafting service back in 1919; and ever since 1915 it has had a Legislative Reference Service, in the Library of Congress, expanding as we have increased our calls upon it, and recently equipped to undertake even more varied and important research than ever before.

Do you have questions of fact or law which must be answered and which your office staff is not equipped to handle readily? Telephone or write the Legislative Reference Service; put your question frankly and clearly; they are your confidential agents for the purposes of your particular inquiry. They will not pretend to give a legal opinion, but they will identify and analyze the law for you; they will analyze a given issue and line up the arguments pro and con; they will run down facts and present them without bias. They are not field investigators, but so far as published sources are available to them, they will ferret out, compile, and analyze data at your request and to the extent of their staff capacity.

It is this matter of staff capacity which is forwarded by the Reorganization Act. Under its provisions the staff of the Legislative Reference Service is being strengthened all along the line, but especially at the top levels, with the intent to have at the service of Congress research men of the very highest ability in the fields where they are most likely to be useful.

If any Member wants to do research himself, excellent facilities are available to him. He need only call the congressional reading room at the Library of Congress and a desk will be reserved for him with attendants to give him every possible assistance.

Do you want to follow the significant periodical press and yet find you have not time to do it? Call the abstracts office of the Legislative Reference Service and have them send you their public affairs abstracts of selected current articles on matters of prime importance.

Do you want to discuss some problem personally? Call the Director of the Legislative Reference Service. If he has someone on his staff versed in the subject matter, he will suit your convenience. At present there are experts available in American government and public administration, congressional organization and procedure, international relations, international trade, law, labor, money and banking, national defense, price economics, State government, taxation, and so on.

We have in the Legislative Reference Service at the Library of Congress a tool of proven value and enlarging possibilities. It is Congress' own answer, based on experience, to the need of committees and individual Members for further help in the complex business of legislating for the Nation.

HOW DO MEMBERS KNOW TO WHOM TO ADDRESS INQUIRIES?

With an expanding Federal service and the growth of governmental machinery, it has been found necessary to bring into being a clearing house known as the Government Information Service. Handling thousands of inquiries asking general information concerning all phases of governmental activity, the Division of Public Inquiries of the Government Information Service, in addition, edits the United States Government Manual, in which is recorded integrated authoritative information on the organization and functions of the departments and agencies of the Federal Government. It is a volume which no congressional office could well do without.

Incidentally, in this connection, I want to call to the attention of the newly elected Members that valuable compilation entitled "Our American Government—What Is It? How Does It Function?" This is House Document No. 465 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, second session, compiled by Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas. Although, in view of the Legislative Reorganization Act, this document, too, is in need of revision—and probably will be revised later this session—there is a tremendous lot of information in it which is still authentic and reliable. It is a cumulative composite of all the attempts of many people to get into one document the answers to the many questions asked by constituents and others concerning our Government. It well repays examination.

HOW ARE BILLS WRITTEN?

Although many bills are written by the Members themselves, the Congress has wisely provided for legislative counsel to aid the Members and the committees in drafting measures of a more complicated nature. This corps of expert legislative draftsmen take note of the general objective sought to be attained by the Member and mold his idea into parliamentary legal form.

When his bill is written up, the Member drops it in the basket on the Clerk's desk. It is then referred to the appropriate committee. Many bills lie in committee undisturbed and are never heard from again. In some cases they have served their purpose without further action. They have advertised the Member and the project. Many bills are introduced that have not the slightest chance of serious consideration or passage.

STAGES OF A BILL IN THE HOUSE

First. Introduction: By a Member by laying the bill on the Clerk's table informally. A Member sometimes introduces a petition only, leaving to the committee the drawing of a bill; such a petition, referred to a committee having jurisdiction over the subject, giving authority to report a bill. Sometimes communications addressed to the House from the executive departments or from other sources are referred to committees by the Speaker and give authority for the committees to originate bills. Messages from the President also are referred by the Speaker of the House and give jurisdiction to the committees receiving them to originate bills.

Second. Reference to a standing committee: Bills are referred under direction of the Speaker. A bill is numbered and printed when referred.

Study of the bill is then undertaken by the committee membership, oftentimes by a subdivision of the committee, before whom proponents and opponents of the contemplated legislation are heard. The various governmental subdivisions to be affected are consulted, and Members of Congress other than committee members are heard.

Third. Reported from the committee: Committees having leave to report at any time make their reports from the floor; other committees make their reports by laying them on the Clerk's table informally. The bill and the report are printed when reported.

Fourth. Placed on the calendar: Occasionally a privileged bill is considered when reported, but usually it is placed with the unprivileged bills on the calendar where it belongs under the rule by direction of the Speaker.

Fifth. Consideration in Committee of the Whole: Bills which do not raise revenue or make or authorize appropriations of money or property do not go through this stage. All other bills are considered in Committee of the Whole. The stages of consideration in Committee of the Whole are: General debate; reading for amendment under the 5-minute rule; order to lay aside with a favorable recommendation or to rise and report; reporting of the bill to the House.

Sixth. Reading a second time in the House: Bills not requiring consideration in Committee of the Whole are read a second time in full, after which they are open to debate and amendment in any part. Bills considered in Committee of the Whole are read a second time in full in that Committee and when reported out with or without amendments are not read in full again, but are subject to further debate or amendment in the House unless the previous question is ordered at once.

Seventh. Engrossment and third reading: The question on House bills is taken on ordering the engrossment and third reading at one vote. If decided in the affirmative, the reading a third time usually takes place at once, by title. But any Member may demand the reading in full of the engrossed copy, in which case the bill is laid aside until it can be engrossed. Senate bills come to the House in engrossed form, and the question is put on third reading alone. When the question on engrossment and third reading of a House bill or third reading of a Senate bill is decided in the negative, the bill is lost as much as if defeated on the final passage. The question on engrossment and third reading is not made from the floor, but is put by the Speaker as a matter of course.

Eighth. Passage: The question on the passage of a bill is put by the Speaker as a matter of course, without awaiting a motion from the floor.

Ninth. Transmission to the Senate by message.

Tenth. Consideration by the Senate: In the Senate, House bills are usually referred to committees for consideration and report, after which they have their several readings, with opportunities for debate and amendment. The same procedure takes place in the House as to bills sent from the Senate.

Eleventh. Return of, from the Senate without amendments: If the Senate passes a House bill without amendment it returns it to the House, where it is at once enrolled on parchment for signature. A bill thus passed without amendment goes into possession of the Clerk and is not laid before the House prior to enrollment. If the Senate rejects a House bill, the House is informed. Similar procedure occurs when the House passes a Senate bill without amendment.

Twelfth. Return of, from the Senate with amendments: House bills returned with Senate amendments go to the Speaker's table. If any Senate amendment requires consideration in Committee of the Whole, the bill is referred by the Speaker informally to the standing committee having jurisdiction, and when that committee reports the bill with recommendations it is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, to be there considered and reported to the House itself. When no Senate amendment requires consideration in Committee of the Whole the bills come before the House directly from the Speaker's table.

Thirteenth. Consideration of Senate amendments by the House: When a bill with Senate amendments comes before the House, the House takes up each amendment by itself and may vote to agree to it, agree to it with an amendment, or disagree to it. If it disagrees, it may ask a conference with the Senate or may send notice of its disagreement, leaving it to the Senate to recede or to insist and ask the conference.

Fourteenth. Settlement of differences by conference: When disagreements are referred to conference, the managers embody their settlement in a report, which is acted on by each House as a whole. When this report is agreed to, the bill is finally passed and is at once enrolled for signature.

Fifteenth. Enrollment on parchment: The House in which a bill originates enrolls it.

Sixteenth. Examination by the Committee on House Administration to see that the bill is correctly enrolled.

Seventeenth. Signing by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate: The enrolled bill is first laid before the Speaker for signature, whether it be a House or a Senate bill, after which it is transmitted to the Senate and signed by the President of that body.

Eighteenth. Transmittal to the President of the United States: It is the duty of the Committee on House Administration to carry the enrolled bill—when it shall have originated in the House—to the President. This duty is performed in the case of bills which have originated in the Senate by the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration.

Nineteenth. Action by the President: He may, first, promptly sign the bill, whereupon it becomes law as of its effective date. He may, second, hold it without taking any action, in which case it becomes law at the expiration of 10 days—Sundays excepted—without his signature, provided Congress is still in session. He may, third, hold the measure, and by so doing, kill it, if Congress adjourns before the bill has been in his hands 10 days—the so-called pocket veto. He may, fourth, veto the bill outright.

Twentieth. Action on, when returned disapproved: The House to which a disapproved bill is returned has the message read and spread on its Journal. It may then consider at once the question of passing the bill notwithstanding the President's objections, or may postpone to a day certain, or refer to a committee for examination. The vote on passing the bill notwithstanding the President's objections must be carried by two-thirds. If the bill fails to pass in the House to which it is returned, it remains there; but if it passes it is sent to the other House for action.

Twenty-first. Filing with the Secretary of State: When approved by the President a bill is deposited in the office of the Secretary of State; and when the two Houses have passed a bill notwithstanding the President's objections, the Presiding Officer of the House which acts on it last transmits it to the Secretary of State.

VETOES

Contrary to the practice followed in most of the State governments, the Chief Executive must approve or disapprove a bill in its entirety; he cannot accept part and reject part.

Nevertheless, not so many bills are vetoed as one might expect. By and large, the opinion of Alexander Hamilton that the veto would "generally be employed with great caution" has been borne out. Grover Cleveland set an all-time high, however, with 358 vetoes, until the administration of Franklin Roosevelt, whose vetoes exceeded Cleveland's considerably.

It is interesting to note that seven Presidents made no use of the veto power whatever, the last of these being President Garfield.

ARE MANY BILLS INTRODUCED?

The all-time high record is held by the Sixty-first Congress, during which 33,015 bills were introduced in the House, and 10,897 in the Senate. More nearly normal, although still above the average, is the number introduced in the Seventy-sixth Congress, 18,754 bills.

Not all the bills introduced are enacted, however. The chances are, roughly, about 1 in 10 that the bill introduced will be enacted into law.

WHAT IS UNANIMOUS CONSENT?

Many little actions are taken in the House by unanimous consent. The Member asks for unanimous consent to do this or that—to correct the RECORD, to speak for 5 minutes or more out of order, to insert remarks in the RECORD, to change an amendment he has offered, to have a letter read. If there is no objection on the part of any Member, then consent is granted. Frequently a gentleman says, "I object," and that settles that.

The leader of the majority makes many unanimous-consent requests, and usually they are granted. He may ask consent to meet at a certain hour, to adjourn over for a day or two, to hold a night session, to have so many hours for debate on a bill, to take up specified matters on certain days out of order, to set days for the Private and Consent Calendars. The granting of the request saves the passing of motions or the making of rules.

Many bills are passed by unanimous consent. All bills of a private character go on the Private Calendar.

And another character of bills go on the Consent Calendar. On days when these bills are in order the Clerk reads the title of the bill, the Speaker asks, "Is there objection?" Any Member may say, "I object," if he desires, in which case the bill cannot be taken up; and the next title is read. If no objection is made, the bill is read and passed very quickly, usually. The theory is that if no one cares to object to a bill certainly many would not vote against it, so it ought to be passed. Both party organizations have several Members who make it their business to study all bills on the Consent Calendars and be ready to object or insist on what they think proper in the way of amendments before consent is granted for the bill to be considered.

Often a Member will arise and say: "Reserving the right to object," and ask questions about the bill. This gives the author of the bill a chance to explain or defend it, and sometimes quite a little debate is stirred up even on consent days. After a while somebody may shout, "Regular order!" The Speaker says, "Regular order is demanded"; whereupon the gentleman who started the trouble by "reserving the right to object" must immediately make his objection or withdraw it. He may be just as apt to do one as the other, and on his decision rests the destiny of some anxious Member's important bill—for all bills are important to their hopeful authors. On consent days Members with bills on the calendar are most patient, polite, and persuasive in their ways toward the gentlemen who sit at the table and whose business it is to inquire into the merits of bills coming up.

HOW ARE THE VOTES TAKEN?

Four different ways. Usually the Speaker puts the question in this form: "As many as are in favor (of the motion) say 'Aye,'" and then, "As many as are opposed say 'No.'" In most instances the vote taken thus is decisive enough to satisfy. But if the Speaker is in doubt, or if it sounds close, any Member may ask for a division. In this case the Speaker asks those in favor to stand up and be counted. Then those opposed to the proposition are asked to stand up and be counted. The Speaker does the counting and then announces the result. But if he is still in doubt, or if a demand is made by one-fifth of a quorum—that is, 20 in the Committee of the Whole or 44 in the House—tellers are ordered. The Speaker appoints one gentleman on each side of the question to make the count. The two tellers take their place at the head of the center aisle. All Members favoring the proposition walk through between the tellers and are counted. Then those opposed walk through and are counted. This vote settles most questions.

But a roll call may be demanded by anybody on any question in the House, and if supported by one-fifth of those present it is ordered. This privilege is guaranteed by the Constitution. The Clerk reads the names of the whole membership, and as his or her name is called the Member answers "Aye" or "No." The names of those not voting the first time are read a second time, so that all Members in corridors, cloakrooms, committee rooms, or offices, who have been notified of a roll call by signal bells, may come in and vote.

Roll calls are ordered sometimes to get a full vote on a measure, because of a lack of a quorum, sometimes because Members want to be on record on a measure, and sometimes to put the other side on record against the measure for imaginary political advantage. The roll calls are published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and are sometimes quoted to a Member's advantage or disadvantage, as the case may be.

Many bills of lesser importance and some of greater importance are passed without a roll call. This can be done if a quorum is present when the vote is taken and as many as one-fifth of those present do not demand a roll call. This is done often to save time and sometimes to save Members the embarrassment of having to be recorded for or against a measure.

WHAT IS A QUORUM?

Everybody who ever attended a literary society knows that it requires a quorum to do business. In the House of Representatives a quorum is a majority of the membership. When there are no vacancies in the membership a quorum is 218. There are usually a few vacancies—Members who have died or resigned and their places yet unfilled. So an actual quorum is usually a little under that figure. Much business is transacted without a quorum. But no business of any character, except to adjourn, can be transacted without a quorum present if any Member objects. All any Member has to do to get a full House is to arise, address the Speaker, and make the point of order that "no quorum is present." The Speaker says, "I will count." If he cannot count a majority present, the doors are closed, the signal bells are rung in the corridors and House Office Building, and the roll is called. This usually produces a quorum, and business proceeds.

When the House is in Committee of the Whole, a hundred Members make a quorum.

IS LEGISLATION MUCH INFLUENCED BY ORATORY?

Not much. People back home may picture the House as a forum for debate upon the merits of the many bills they read about. It is in a way, but most of the debate is as potent as a sham battle. Very few bills that are brought up in the House for action under general or special rules are defeated. I think more than 95 percent of bills thus brought up are passed, despite the forensic display of oratory that may be directed against them, and usually is, by the minority or the opposition. Hardly one amendment in 40 offered to bills on the floor is adopted unless offered or accepted by the committee reporting out the bill which is up for consideration.

Legislation enacted by any Congress is largely that originating with or sponsored by the majority party. Important measures brought up have had thorough scrutiny and a favorable report by a well-organized committee. They have probably had strong backing from the country. Some have had the approval of the steering committee and some have been reported out by the Rules Committee. Such measures are on the program for passage, and long debates and much oratory cannot defeat them. On the other hand, bills that are not slated for passage do not often get up for action in the House.

Committee responsibility is great and committee action influential. On most amendments and on most bills a majority of the Members vote most of the time with the committee—and it is difficult to break into that influence even with fine oratory.

WHAT ARE THE DUTIES OF THE SPEAKER?

He presides over the House, appoints the Chairman to preside over the Committee of the Whole, appoints all select and conference committees, has the power of recognition of Members, makes many important rulings and decisions in the House. The Speaker may vote, but usually does not except in a case of a tie. He may appoint a Speaker pro tempore but not for more than 3 days at a time without the consent of the House.

WHAT IS A PARTY LEADER?

There is a majority leader and a minority leader. In talk on the floor we do not refer to Democrats and Republicans usually. It is more dignified, it seems, to refer to the majority and the minority. The majority leader has the more influence, of course, since he has the majority of the membership back of him.

The leader is all the title implies. He leads in party debate, brings forward party programs and policies. His advocacy of or opposition to proposed legislation indicates the party preference. The majority leader has much control over what comes up and when on the legislative program from week to week. When he makes a motion it is nearly always carried. He usually makes the motion to adjourn, and it always carries. If someone else, not authorized to do so, makes a motion to adjourn, it is nearly always defeated.

WHAT ARE THE CHAPLAINS' DUTIES?

Both Senate and House have a chaplain, who offers prayer at the opening of each daily session, usually at 12 o'clock noon. Both are eloquent and godly men. The prayers are printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the proceedings each day.

WHAT ARE THE DUTIES OF THE WHIP?

The whip is not an official position. It is a party designation. Both parties have their whips. The whip looks after the membership of his party, advises them of weekly programs, and endeavors to have all present when important measures are to be voted upon. When the vote is apt to be close, the whip checks up, finds out who is out of the city, and advises the absent Members by wire of the important measure coming up.

The efficacy of the majority in securing the legislation it desires and of the minority in making felt its opposition depends upon the efficiency of the party machinery on the floor. The party whips are vital cogs in this machinery.

WHAT IS PRINTED THAT BEST TELLS OF THE CONGRESS?

The Constitution of the United States is the most informative thing printed dealing with the Congress. It provides the authority for Congress, specifies its duties, powers, privileges, and much of the procedure in both Houses of Congress. The Constitution is not very long, is easily obtainable in any city or town, and should be read occasionally by every citizen. It will surprise you how much information it contains.

HOW OLD IS THE CONSTITUTION?

It was adopted by the Federal Constitutional Convention in 1787, ratified by the several States, and the new Government provided for by it became fully operative with the inauguration of George Washington as President of the United States on April 30, 1789.

HOW CAN THE CONSTITUTION BE AMENDED?

A proposal to amend the Constitution must be passed by the Congress by a two-thirds vote of the Members present in both House and Senate. The proposed amendment then must be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States or by conventions in three-fourths of the States; the choice of method of ratification rests with the Congress.

HAVE MANY CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS BEEN ADOPTED?

No, not very many; only 21 in 158 years, and this question brings out some interesting figures and dates.

The first 10 amendments to the Constitution were proposed by the First Congress in 1789 and were practically agreed to before the adoption of the Constitution. It is these first 10 amendments which make up our Bill of Rights.

The eleventh and twelfth amendments were proposed in 1794 and 1803. Since 1804 when the twelfth amendment was ratified, over a period of 143 years, only nine amendments have been adopted to the Constitution.

The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments relate to abolition of slavery, rights of citizenship, and the franchise, coming after the Civil War, and were proposed and ratified between 1865 and 1870.

Since the Civil War period only six amendments have been ratified, as follows:

Sixteenth amendment provides power for Congress to levy a tax on incomes. It was ratified in 1913.

Seventeenth amendment provides that United States Senators shall be elected by popular vote. Previous to its adoption Senators had been chosen by State legislatures. Proposed in 1912 and ratified in 1913.

Eighteenth amendment provides for prohibition. It was proposed in 1917 and ratified in 1919; subsequently it was ratified by all States in the Union except two.

Nineteenth amendment provides the right of suffrage to women. Proposed in 1919, it was ratified in 1920.

Twentieth amendment is the so-called lame-duck amendment. It relates to the terms of the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives and sets the time the Congress shall convene. It was adopted in 1933.

The twenty-first amendment repealed the eighteenth or prohibition amendment to the Constitution. It, too, was adopted in 1933.

ARE AMENDMENTS SOMETIMES PROPOSED BUT REJECTED BY THE STATES?

Yes; that has occurred several times. Amendments were proposed in 1789—two—1810, 1861, and 1924, that were not ratified by the States. All of these except the last one are out of date, of no use now, and time has shown the wisdom of their rejection.

The one submitted to the States in 1924 was known as the child-labor amendment and reads in part:

> The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

So far 28 States have ratified this proposed amendment. Since 36 States must ratify an amendment to make it effective, it would appear that this one also has been lost. Recent social legislation on the part of the various States has materially decreased the alleged necessity for its enactment, however.

WHO PAYS FOR SPEECHES MEMBERS MAIL OUT?

The Senator or Congressman pays for the speeches he sends out. They are printed usually at the Government Printing Office and are charged for at cost price, but the cost price is about what they would cost in a privately operated print shop. A Member will often send out another Member's speech on some subject he thinks will be of interest to his own constituents.

In the fiscal year 1939, Members paid the Public Printer $60,488.47 for speeches. Ten years before, in 1929, the sum was $66,400.07.

WHAT OF THE INFLUENCES OF SENIORITY OR LENGTH OF SERVICE?

In no other place, perhaps, in this broad land of ours does seniority or length of service cut so much figure as it does in the Congress of the United States.

It is the first discouraging thing the new Member meets, and many have been the bitter denunciations of its rule. Right or wrong, however, the rule of seniority has long been an important factor in the Congress, and no one these days has the optimism to predict that it will soon be abolished.

The new Member meets the rule of seniority when he applies for his first office room. He gets only what is left after all older Members have made their selections. He may file on a vacant room in the House Office Building. Another Member who has served before may come along and take it away from him. He may file on numerous rooms and see them go to older Members. The oldest Member, in point of service in the Congress, requesting a vacant office room gets it.

He meets with the seniority rule at any official dinner he attends. The new Member sits near the foot of the table; the older Members, in the order of their term of service, near the head of the table.

The new Members find the rule of seniority when they apply for committee assignment. The older Members are given the favored places; the new Members must work their way up. The new Member finds it in the committee room when he attends the first meeting of his committee. He finds his name on his place at the foot of the table. The oldest member of the committee will probably be the chairman at the head of the table. And by length of service they rank down to the newest members at the foot.

New Members are welcome and are shown every courtesy on the floor. They are never hazed or snubbed. But there are some years in the beginning of their service when new Members must feel that they are hardly in the thick of things—when they must think that they would like to sit, even in the committee room, up near the middle of the table.

The important places in the House go to the older Members. Choice committee assignments as a rule go to the older Members who desire them. The chairman of every committee is, almost without exception, the longest-serving majority member on the committee. Chairmen of committees have a good deal of influence and get their names on the most important bills.

A great deal of legislation is written by or determined by the conferees on conference committees between the House and Senate. Almost invariably the conferees appointed by both House and Senate are the oldest—in point of service—Republicans and the oldest Democratic members serving on the committees reporting out the bills in each House. Conferees have had much to do with the final writing of appropriation and tariff bills especially, as well as with many other important bills in which there is a difference between House and Senate. Members may orate and the two Houses may vote, but the conferees, the old boys, bring back the language agreed upon, and it will be adopted.

Of course, this seniority influence is not unique nor original in the Congress. It works similarly in every legislative body in the country, from the city council up. It works in the local lodges and grand lodges of every order. It is especially strong in the national meetings of a number of church organizations. It is particularly noticed in the Congress and commented upon because the Congress is more or less a permanent working body of long standing and represents all the people of our country.

Legislation is unquestionably much influenced by the men who have served long and occupy these important places in the organization of the House, and greater influence in and with the departments is certainly felt by those who have had the advantage of knowledge and acquaintance gained by years on the job. This long service in the House brings Members in contact with the personnel of the several departments and helps them to be of service in many little and some big ways to their constituents back home.

Seniority or length of service in the House of Representatives is certainly a large factor in giving a Member position and influence in the Congress and in Washington. Brilliance and unusual ability, of course, count for much, but without years of service they do not get one far here. Those districts which have returned their Members of proven ability term after term have contributed much toward the cause of good government and are today represented in Congress by Members who have standing and influence in Washington.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GWYNNE of Iowa asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement on portal-to-portal pay made by John P. Frye, president of the metal trades department of the A. F. of L.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I arise to pay tribute to the memory of a true gentleman of the press, Mark Thistlethwaite, whose funeral will be held here tomorrow.

President Truman, Senators, Congressmen, colleagues of the Press Gallery, all have expressed their sympathy to his widow and mourn his loss. As the New York Times said of him yesterday:

> Mr. Thistlethwaite was known in Washington and throughout the country as an old-school reporter who represented the finest traditions of his craft.

Born in Richmond, Ind., March 17, 1879, he attended school there and graduated from Swarthmore College in 1901. Having worked as a reporter in Philadelphia, he returned to Indiana and held various assignments on Indianapolis newspapers.

An ardent Democrat, he never let partisanship creep into his newspaper copy. Mark became secretary to Gov. Tom Marshall, of Indiana, in 1909. He came to Washington when Marshall became Vice President and remained his secretary throughout two terms.

In that capacity he learned many inside facts about the last days of President Wilson in the White House. But he declined to capitalize on these secrets by writing books in the backstairs gossipy manner.

He became and remained until his death the Washington correspondent of the Indianapolis News, Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette, and the Terre Haute Tribune. Throughout the years he came to know intimately all the political and journalistic leaders of his time.

With his background of intimate history he often was interviewed by other reporters, yes, and statesmen, seeking facts. Even more he was sought out by those who wanted sympathy and understanding. For Mark Thistlethwaite had the great gift of remaining calm in a confused world.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MILLER of Connecticut (at the request of Mr. LODGE), for 1 week, on account of illness.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 15, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God, before whom one day we shall all have to give account, lend us Thine aid, that this day's work may be well pleasing unto Thee.

If there be any here sulking as children will, deal with and enlighten him. Make it day about that person, so that he shall see himself and be ashamed. Make it heaven about him, Lord, by the only way to heaven, forgetfulness of self, and make it day about his neighbors, so that they shall help and not hinder him. Forgetful ourselves, help us to bear cheerfully the forgetfulness of others. Give us courage, and faith, and the quiet mind. Give life to our good intentions, lest they be still-born. Bless us in all that is right, and correct us in all that is wrong. We ask of Thee this help and mercy for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 15, 1947, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN] be excused from the sessions of the Senate until Wednesday of next week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE ECONOMIC REPORT

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, during the last session of the Congress I was honored by being appointed a member of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report. I was appointed by the then President pro tempore of the Senate. I should like to ask the Senate for permission to be relieved of the duties of membership on that committee and to have some other Senator appointed in my place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire that he be relieved from service on the Joint Committee on the Economic Report? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from

New Hampshire is excused from further service on the joint committee.

The Chair would like now to complete the membership of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report.

On the majority side, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] holds over. The new appointments from the majority side will be the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. WATKINS].

On the minority side, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] hold over, and the new member on the minority side will be the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

MAJORITY AND MINORITY POLICY COMMITTEES

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement for the general information of the Senate.

The Reorganization Act passed at the last session recommended that the majority party and the minority party should each at the beginning of each Congress appoint a policy committee of seven members, for the formulation of over-all policies for the respective parties. The provision of the law leaves action under it wholly discretionary with each party and makes no provision for recording the action of the two parties. It seems to me, however, that there should be an authorized statement of the action of the two parties with respect to the establishment and membership of these committees. I am therefore advising the Senate that the majority has made the first seven members of its steering committee its policy committee. These representatives of the majority are the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HAWKES], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON].

The steering committee of the majority has two additional members, making a total of nine on the steering committee. The limitation of the policy committee by the statute to seven members precludes the appointment of those two steering committee members to the policy committee; but I should like to say for the further information of the Senate that those two members will be called in constant consultation and that the steering committee will be in fact the policy committee of the majority party.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in the same connection I wish to state that I agree wholly with the suggestion, which the Senator from Maine and I have discussed privately, that there ought to be some record made in the RECORD of the proceedings, I think, and in the Journal perhaps, concerning the identity of the two policy committees.

As the Senator will recall, when the Reorganization Act was before the Senate it provided for majority and minority policy committees. When the bill reached the House the Members of that body decided they did not want that provision applicable to them, and it was eliminated, with a sort of understanding that when the bill making appropriations for deficiencies for the legislative branch of the Government came up provision would be made for the two policy committees representing, respectively, the majority and the minority of the Senate. The appropriation bill did not say how they should be selected, whether they should be chosen in a formal or informal way, or whether any record need be made of them; but in order that the two committees may have a legal status and be authorized to select members of their staffs I have felt that there ought to be an announcement of record as to the membership of these two committees so that they would have a legal status.

In the conference of the minority the matter was brought up for discussion and action, and the conference authorized me as chairman of the conference to select the policy committee representing the minority with the provision that I should be chairman of it. I have exercised the authority conferred upon me by the minority conference and have in addition to my own name, which they proposed themselves, selected the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] as members of the minority policy committee.

In a sense the same situation as that referred to by the Senator from Maine with respect to two members of the majority steering committee arose regarding the minority whip of the Senate and the secretary of the minority conference. It was felt that, in view of the position held by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] as the whip and the position held by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], that they would not be assigned to the policy committee but they will be invited, as all other members of the minority of course will be invited, and will be free to sit with the policy committee and advise it whenever it is necessary and desirable without the power to vote.

I send the list of the names I mentioned to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that any action by the Senate is necessary in respect to these appointments.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate by the President pro tempore and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A petition of teachers of the high school at Barceloneta, P. R., praying for the confirmation of the nomination of Mariano Villaronga as commissioner of education of Puerto Rico; to the Committee on Public Lands.

NOMINATIONS TO ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to remind both the majority and minority leaders in this connection that there are still being held at the desk nominations for the Atomic Energy Commission awaiting the completion of the Senate membership on the Joint Atomic Committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to state, representing the minority, that I think an announcement may be made from this side with reference to that matter today.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Does the Senator have any objection to the nomination of Mr. Wiggins?

Mr. LANGER. No.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, of course if we adhered strictly to the rules, the action proposed would not be in order, but I understand these recommendations come unanimously from the Finance Committee of the Senate and, under the circumstances, I make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that there will necessarily be an executive session of the Senate later this afternoon.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Then I shall defer the request until that time.

PROHIBITION OF ADVERTISEMENTS OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of advertisements of alcoholic beverages. I have introduced this bill in each Congress for several years as it is my firm belief the proposed legislation is necessary for the proper regulation of such advertising in the separate States.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 265) to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of advertisements of alcoholic beverages, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. CAPPER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, in this connection I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point, an editorial entitled "Thirteen Years of Repeal," written by Dr. Raphael Harwood Miller, formerly pastor of the National City Christian Church, of Washington, D. C., and now editor of the Christian Evangelist, in which publication this article appeared on January 8, 1947.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIRTEEN YEARS OF REPEAL

The American Businessmen's Research Foundation will publish in the next issue of The Foundation Says an appraisal of 13 years of the prohibition repeal period.

These data are generally suppressed or ignored by newspapers and periodicals which carry liquor advertising. We select a few items of special significance, both to those who favor and those who oppose national prohibition.

Those who favored repeal promised "the saloon will not return." Now there are 407,000 of them. The saloon is back in politics and in crime records. Obscured windows, low lights, illegal dancing, gambling, selling to drunkards, selling to under-age children, and other law violations were found in 75 percent of Chicago's 7,000 saloons by a Government-financed, independent investigation.

Since 1932 arrests of drinking drivers increased 45.2 percent. In 13 years of repeal there have been 12,000,000 arrests for drunkenness, driving while intoxicated, disorderly conduct and liquor-law violations—an upswing of 51.3 percent per 100,000 population in cities alone. A pall was cast over the recent Christmas in many cities by traffic deaths and crimes against children caused by drink. In the city of Los Angeles the jail booking office was swamped with arrests for drunken driving and drink-in-automobile cases.

We were promised "taxes will be reduced." During prohibition, taxes took 12.6 percent of the national income. During repeal (excluding war years) taxes took a 50-percent increase, and the national debt (before the war) increased up to $42,000,000. Wets claimed that liquor taxes would fill depleted public treasuries. Instead, for every liquor-tax dollar paid to Federal, State, and local governments, the "trade" has cost the people, and legitimate retail business, at least $5—fifty-nine billions diverted to the brewer and distiller, plus the cost of social and economic waste due to liquor.

The official Massachusetts legislative survey of liquor traffic revealed that in 1943 liquor taxes aggregating $13,139,266 were staggeringly offset by a cost to the State of $61,000,000 outlay to care for liquor-bred insanity, crime, dependents, etc. This $61,000,000 was exclusive of the direct liquor bill of the State, conservatively estimated at more than $200,000,000.

Under prohibition, according to an authoritative Government survey made in 1930, the consumption of beverage alcohol dropped more than 65 percent (from the high mark of the legalized liquor traffic in 1914 to the year 1929). Under repeal, more and more people are drinking more and more intoxicants.

The Foundation says that Bert F. McCann, vice president of the National Beer Wholesalers Association, has labeled the 4 years of the World War as a "sales honeymoon." This was a gross income of $10,680,000,000 for brewers and beer sellers while 10,000,000 American boys went out to fight and, if need be, to die for democracy.

Not a single argument for the benefits of repeal as against the evils of prohibition is sustained by the facts. A United States Government survey in 1930 showed there had been a drop of at least 65 percent in known per capita consumption of beverage alcohol since 1914. The past 13 years have shown an 81½-percent increase.

The sole aim of the restored saloon is not temperance but to provide more and more intoxicants to more and more drinkers. It is estimated that 50,000,000 Americans, which is half of all Americans over 15 years of age, drink some form of beverage alcohol.

The $100,000,000 annually spent on liquor advertising is getting the desired results to induce nondrinkers to drink, to turn moderate drinkers into inebriates, and to manufacture and sell liquor without limit.

PRESERVATION OF FORT WAYNE MILITARY RESERVATION

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, the recently announced decision by the War Department to abandon Fort Wayne has made a deep impression on the city of Detroit. When the announcement was made, our common council appointed a committee, consisting of George Edwards, president of the common council; Charles G. Oakman, councilman; William G. Rogell, councilman; Ernest Jones, Commissioner of Purchases and Supplies; and Homer R. Marson, city controller, as a committee to look into the acquisition of this property.

This is of great interest to the civic leaders of Detroit, who are fearful that Fort Wayne may be razed; that is, that the fort may be destroyed. It is universally agreed that the destruction of the fort would be a tragedy and that every effort should be bent to insure the preservation of this symbol of a bygone day.

Certainly the interest of the people of Detroit in this property goes beyond that of any agency, public or private. It follows that no agency other than the city of Detroit can put it to such good use. No other agency can so well serve the public interest, for the city's intentions transcend the mere utilization of the physical property as such. It proposes to preserve for posterity the historically significant portions; to develop the old fort as a permanent historical museum and the grounds around it as a public park.

These are the long-range objectives. But the city also has immediate and urgent need for many of the facilities now standing on the property. For example, it needs the dwellings and barracks as emergency housing for veterans, the hospital to furnish necessary health facilities to the west side citizens, the vacant areas as playgrounds for the youth of the neighborhood. Furthermore, it is anxious to cooperate with the local units of the Michigan National Guard to enable that organization to use some of the buildings as a temporary armory.

Fort Wayne has been a Detroit landmark for more than a century. Located in the heart of the heavily populated west side, it is the embodiment of important periods of the city's history. It should be placed under the guardianship of the municipality to insure that it will be preserved for the inspiration of generations yet unborn.

The city fathers of Detroit, Mr. President, have set forth in a pamphlet the reasons this property should be conveyed to the city of Detroit and not declared surplus property, and disposed of as such. At this time I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill which would provide for the conveyance of the fort to the city of Detroit, and I ask that the bill be referred to the appropriate committee. At the same time I ask to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the pamphlet issued by the city fathers of Detroit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill introduced by the junior Senator from Michigan will be received and appropriately referred, and the Chair may add the blessing of the senior Senator from Michigan.

Without objection, the pamphlet referred to will be published in the RECORD pursuant to the request of the junior Senator from Michigan.

The bill (S. 270) providing for the conveyance to the city of Detroit, Mich., of the Fort Wayne Military Reservation, introduced by Mr. FERGUSON, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

The pamphlet, presented by Mr. FERGUSON, is as follows:

FORT WAYNE: A PLAN FOR ITS PRESERVATION UNDER THE GUARDIANSHIP OF DETROIT AS A HISTORICAL MONUMENT

Fort Wayne remains today the only significant physical reminder of Detroit's historic past. Gen. Anthony Wayne, coming to take possession of Detroit in 1796 for the United States, landed at Springwells, the present site of the fort. During the War of 1812, the land on which it stands was used as the camp ground for the victorious American Army, following the Battle of the Thames.

The fort itself was commenced in 1842 and is a fine specimen of American fortification of a century ago. The original barracks building within the bastions is considered one of the best architectural examples of that era. In this section of Michigan the rapid growth of our cities has destroyed nearly all the fine old buildings. Only Fort Wayne remains. Thus it is the more valuable.

Fort Wayne is the last in a succession of posts and forts built in Detroit. Fort Pontchartrain, established by Cadillac in 1701, has left no physical trace. The same must be said of the citadel of Fort Detroit, built in the 1760's. During the American Revolution, the British constructed Fort Lernoult, and in 1796 it was occupied by American troops under Gen. Anthony Wayne, by whom it was renamed Fort Shelby, in honor of Gen. Isaac Shelby, of Kentucky. Of this structure, only a few logs have survived to be preserved as museum pieces.

But Fort Wayne still stands much as it was constructed over 100 years ago. It has continually served Detroit and the Nation throughout those years and through five wars. From the Mexican War to World War II, it has been a center for recruiting, training, and equipping men from this area to fight for their country.

The very abandonment of the fort as a military post has historical significance, for this act is a striking testimonial to the bond of understanding and friendship which has long existed between this Nation and Canada. Its preservation as a historical memorial would be a fitting symbol of the existing good-neighbor relations.

Detroit needs a dynamic symbol of her debt to the past, and the preservation of Fort Wayne as a historical memorial would furnish her with that symbol. The city has no other.

Communities which have preserved significant historical sites and buildings derive much benefit from their stimulation of civic pride and national patriotism. Three well-known examples in this area are Fort Niagara near Buffalo, Fort Snelling at Minneapolis-St. Paul, and the island Fort Mackinac. Travelers as well as residents not only enjoy inspection of such historical sites but gain an understanding of the history of the area and a just pride in our common heritage.

The educational and patriotic value of historic sites and monuments is incalculable. Those which have been preserved are annually visited by tens of thousands, and this would doubtless hold true for Fort Wayne. Most historic monuments of this type have small museums in the barracks building, containing materials directly relating to the history of the site and telling the story of the structure and its place in American history. A similar collection could be housed at Fort Wayne, where it would be within easy reach of all the school children of Detroit.

The fort has other values, too. It typifies military construction of 100 years ago. The heavy brick-and-masonry structures are fine examples of craftsmanship. The barracks are a standing lesson in the architectural style and construction methods of that period. Finally, there is an Indian mound on the site which calls attention to the culture of a race which has practically vanished from the city.

Fort Wayne was built to insure the security of the United States and most especially to protect the people of this region. It has served well. It should continue to serve, not as a fortress, but as a historical museum which will foster a deep and abiding patriotism throughout the community and throughout the Nation.

As a reminder of a noble history and a harbinger of a challenging future, as a continuing tribute to those who have served this country in the past and to those who are serving it now, the flag of Fort Wayne must be kept flying.

AS A MAJOR PARK

Ultimately the city of Detroit would convert the 90 acres of land surrounding the old fort into a fine riverside park—an appropriate setting for a significant and historic military monument which will attract visitors from all the 48 States of the Union.

But the park would do more than this. With its half mile of river frontage, it would bring healthful recreation to many, many thousands of Detroit's vast population—give them the opportunity to relax, to walk along the river's edge—an opportunity now denied them. For Detroit is sadly lacking in riverfront parks. Except for two small playfields, there is not a single park on the river west of Belle Isle Bridge—a distance of more than 10 miles. Furthermore, because of the intense utilization of the water front by industry, there is small likelihood that such facilities can ever be developed in this section, unless the city acquires Fort Wayne.

By a peculiar coincidence, the area from which this park would draw most of its patronage—the densely populated west side—is singularly deficient in recreational facilities. For example, those portions of Congressional Districts 13, 15, and 16, lying within the city of Detroit, west of Woodward Avenue and south of Grand Boulevard and Tireman, have a population approaching half a million. Yet they contain within their borders only 66 acres classified as major park lands.

In view of these circumstances, it is imperative that Fort Wayne, the last waterfront park site available in the down-river section, be dedicated to serve the people of Detroit.

AS A COMMUNITY CENTER

It is generally admitted that there exists in Detroit a serious shortage of recreational facilities of all kinds, a situation which the present administration is striving strenuously to correct. As has already been pointed out, the area immediately surrounding Fort Wayne suffers most acutely from this shortage. However, the very nature of the district, which is almost entirely built-up and which contains a great concentration of heavy industry, makes the acquisition of adequate recreational facilities very difficult.

According to minimum standards, the neighborhood should have in playfield and playgrounds, as distinguished from park lands, three times the area that it now has.

The situation is so serious that for some time local groups have been insisting that something be done about it. Recognizing the scarcity of vacant land, they have even gone so far as to apply for permission to use property owned by one of the huge industries in the vicinity.

If Fort Wayne is entrusted to the city of Detroit, it will make possible the development of a major community center to serve these people and to provide not only indoor facilities, but baseball fields, football fields, tennis courts, swimming pools, dockage for small boats, etc. It is generally agreed that adequate recreational opportunities are essential to the building of good citizens. Acquisition of Fort Wayne will enable Detroit to give these opportunities to large numbers of its youth and its industrial workers who are now denied them and who undeniably have the most urgent need for them.

AS A TEMPORARY ARMORY FOR THE NATIONAL GUARD

The Michigan National Guard in the Detroit area is plagued at this very moment with an acute shortage of armory facilities. The main armory, a converted factory building, located at Piquette and Brush, is hopelessly inadequate for its needs, and the situation will be intensified when local units of the guard are built up to full strength. This will occur in the very near future, and when it does, there will be stationed in the Detroit area more than twice as many guardsmen as there were in the entire State of Michigan in 1938.

Eventually, when the State erects permanent armories for the use of troops stationed in Detroit, the crisis confronting the guard will undoubtedly be relieved. In the meantime, permission to use certain of the buildings in the Fort Wayne grounds, even temporarily, would be an undisguised blessing for the organization.

Responsible officers have indicated that the guard could put the present motor supply warehouse to immediate and effective use as headquarters for infantry battalions. They have also expressed a desire to obtain the use of the group of nine smaller buildings near the river, together with the paved area surrounding them.

The aspirations of both the National Guard and the city of Detroit in regard to Fort Wayne have been fully discussed by representatives of the two agencies, and they are in complete agreement. If control of Fort Wayne passes to the city, steps will be taken immediately to make available to the guard, on a temporary basis, the facilities enumerated above.

AS TEMPORARY HOUSING FOR VETERANS

The shortage of housing in Detroit is still as serious as it ever has been, and the prospect of easing the situation in the near future is lamentably dim. Thousands of returned veterans are unable to buy or rent accommodations for themselves and their families. Every interested agency in the city is swamped with appeals from desperate home seekers. Their files are filled with documents revealing the most pitiful situations. Yet very little can be done to alleviate them.

It is estimated that the barracks and dwellings now standing at Fort Wayne could accommodate the families of around 200 homeless Detroit veterans. Granted that this is not a large number compared with the total need, it still would represent a most welcome addition to the city's housing supply.

Because of the large number of heavy industries which surround the Fort, good city planning argues against the permanent utilization of this property for residential purposes. But as a temporary expedient, to help relieve the pressure of the present emergency, the use of existing buildings as housing for homeless veterans would contribute significantly to the common good.

AS AN EMERGENCY AND INDUSTRIAL HOSPITAL

Among the buildings on the Fort Wayne property is a small hospital. This facility could be put to immediate use to help relieve the present shortage of hospital beds in the Detroit area. A recently-published survey of Michigan hospitals, conducted by the Kellogg Foundation, estimates this local shortage at no fewer than 1,952 beds.

The situation in southwest Detroit is undeniably acute. Conservatively, the section should have at its disposal approximately 550 beds. It actually has at the present moment a total of 177. Of these, 72 are in the Delray General Hospital, 70 in the Lincoln Hospital, and 35 in the William Booth Hospital. Thus, there is today an apparent need of 370 additional beds in this section.

If the hospital now located at Fort Wayne were operated by the city as a general and industrial hospital, it would obviously help greatly in alleviating this serious situation.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

Mr. McCARRAN submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con Res. 4), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 2,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 248, Seventy-ninth Congress, entitled "Administrative Procedure Act—Legislative History, Seventy-ninth Congress," of which 1,000 copies shall be assigned to the Senate document room and 1,500 copies to the House document room.

AUTHORIZATION FOR JOINT COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY TO EXPEND CERTAIN FUNDS

Mr. HICKENLOOPER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 59), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the unobligated balance on February 1, 1947, in the contingent fund of the Senate to the credit of the Special Committee on Atomic Energy, created by Senate Resolution 179, agreed to October 22, 1945, hereby is authorized to be expended by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, created by the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, approved August 1, 1946, to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate on vouchers approved by the Chairman.

CONDOLENCES ON DEATH OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF BYRD ANTARCTIC EXPEDITION

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, there is on the calendar of the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, Senate Resolution 58, which I ask at this time to have considered and agreed to. It is a resolution tendering the condolences of the Senate to the families of certain members of the Byrd Antarctic Expedition killed in a recent airplane crash. It was offered by me in conjunction with the Senators from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. STEWART], the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], and the Senators from Virginia [Mr. BYRD and Mr. ROBERTSON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has asked unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate Resolution 58, which the clerk will state by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 58) tendering the condolences of the Senate to the families of certain members of the Byrd Antarctic Expedition killed in an airplane crash.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have no possible objection to the resolution itself, but I should want it considered with the understanding that it would not displace the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. WHITE. Then I join in the hope that the resolution will be immediately agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I should like to hear stated again the purpose of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will again read the title of the resolution.

The title of the resolution was again read.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas Ensign Maxwell Albert Lopez, of Newport, R. I.; Aviation Machinist's Mate First Class Frederick Warren Williams, of Huntingdon, Tenn.; and Aviation Radioman Second Class Wendell Keith Henderson, of Portsmouth, Va., lost their lives in the crash of a plane while on a photographic mission of the Byrd Antarctic Expedition; and

Whereas the deaths of these men were the first casualties of this historic expedition; and

Whereas they were engaged in scientific investigations and extraordinary aerial explorations the results of which may possibly prove of inestimable scientific value to the future of mankind and of great national importance to the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby tenders its condolences to the families of the deceased and expresses its gratitude for the heroic services of these men; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit a copy of these resolutions to the family of each of the deceased.

REDUCTION OF AUTOMOBILE PRICES BY FORD MOTOR CO.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, a great step in our economic life was taken on January 15, 1947, by Henry Ford II, of Detroit, when he announced that the Ford Motor Co. would reduce the prices of Ford cars. At that time he made a statement which I would like to insert in the RECORD.

I think it is well for us to have the Ford statement in mind when we hear from many sides that there will be a continuation of the inflationary movement. Furthermore, I think it is well to keep the statement in mind in view of the fact that until recently there were many who felt that the only way America could proceed without inflation was by resort to regimentation or price regulation by the Office of Price Administration. I think this is a lesson in economics.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD Mr. Ford's complete statement.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Looking back over the economic history of the United States, is it not a fact, I will ask the Senator from Michigan, that the same Ford management in this and another generation has always exhibited a high degree of business acumen and perspicacity, and its action in this instance is in line with its past actions?

Mr. FERGUSON. I agree wholeheartedly with the Senator. I think its latest action is in harmony with the series of actions the Ford company has taken during the years.

Mr. TOBEY. I concur.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Although more than one million of our customers are waiting for delivery of their cars at present prices, we are immediately reducing the price of every Ford car—some models as much as $50.

This is our down payment toward a continued high level of production and employment in the months ahead. We believe that the shock treatment of prompt action is needed to halt the insane spiral of mounting costs and rising prices and to restore a sound base for the hopeful period of postwar production we are now entering.

Let me review briefly the considerations which have led us to take this important step.

The Ford Motor Co. is in the mass production business. Mass production depends upon large markets. It will continue to succeed only if it can produce more and more at lower and lower cost so that more and more people can buy. Large markets begin to disappear when prices rise.

The un-American spiral of mounting costs and rising prices has hurt everybody—some groups more than others. Many have not benefited from postwar wage increases, but have had to share the burden of resulting higher prices. Already, millions of American families are unable to buy the things which, in normal times, make up their standard of living.

In the short view, we can see inflation. In the long view, there is danger of depression.

The period since VJ-day has been an unhappy and costly period of reconversion to peacetime production. Ford Motor Co. has lost millions of dollars since VJ-day, even after all tax adjustments.

But the crisis of this wild aftermath of war seems to have been passed. Our own production, though still limited by material shortages, is now steadier. Productivity of our employees, which hit a new low during the period, seems to have started its return to normal. Ford Motor Co. made a modest profit for the last 3 months of 1946, and we intend to continue to operate in the black.

The American economy now stands at a turning point. Mounting costs and rising prices have warranted caution and hesitancy. There is even general fear that this dangerous, un-American cycle cannot be corrected without an economic recession. We think this fear can be dispelled by common sense and action. And among free men that becomes an individual responsibility.

The Ford Motor Co., therefore, proposes to accept its losses since VJ-day as an item of the cost of a great and victorious war. We are closing our books on that phase of our production history. We have decided that now is the time for us to make an investment in the future.

Because they must build up depleted cash reserves or because they are still losing money, many businesses may not be able to follow suit. But we hope that our suppliers, our employees, and our other economic partners will back, each to his own ability, our attempt to return to the economic pattern which has helped to make America great—the principle that higher wages and a higher standard of living for all depend upon lower costs and lower prices through increasingly efficient large-scale production.

We hope, as we move forward, that we will be able to reduce prices further, and that we will not be forced to raise them again to compensate for cost increases.

CREATION OF CONTINUING CONGRESSIONAL-STATE STUDY COMMISSION

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the Senate a matter which I feel is of first importance and is imminent because of the pending discussions of the National Budget and the tax situation. What I have reference to is the pending tax rivalry between the Federal Government and the several States.

During the war the States very properly had to give up various sources of taxation because of the war effort. In many instances, I am advised, they were assured that with the close of the war these sources of taxation would be restored to them.

In my own State of New Jersey we are embarrassed at the present moment because practically all our important sources of taxation have been absorbed by the Federal Government and we are at a loss to know where to turn in order to meet some pressing needs, and particularly financial aid for our educational program. The plight of the teachers in our public schools is deplorable, and we need to find sources of income in order to take care of that problem.

Mr. President, I hope to address the Senate on this subject at greater length at a later date, but for the moment I desire to read into the RECORD a very able presentation of this issue by the distinguished Governor-elect of the State of New Jersey, the Honorable Alfred E. Driscoll, which he made in Chicago yesterday before the eighth general assembly of the Council of State governments. Governor-elect Driscoll, in his remarks, urges the creation of a continuing congressional-State study commission to ease competition for the tax dollar. I concur wholeheartedly with Governor Driscoll's proposals.

I quote the following challenging statement of Governor-elect Driscoll which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune this morning, Friday, January 17:

We no longer can afford the luxury of 49 tax programs, each unrelated to the other. I am deeply concerned with the State-Federal competition for the tax dollar, and with the invasion of the Federal Government into the same tax field.

ASKS FEDERAL WITHDRAWAL

I would like to see our States, in concert with the Federal Government, reexamine and redefine the duties of each level of government, to eliminate overlapping functions and administrations. The present confusion almost certainly will lead to disaster.

The solution to the present confusion is to be found in the withdrawal of the Federal Government from certain tax fields, and the reservation of those fields to the States. For example, the income tax, I believe, should be purely Federal, but gasoline and liquor taxes should be reserved to the States.

The emphasis of the national administration has too long been to treat the States as competitive centers of political power. Nor have the States themselves appeared particularly willing to adopt any common policy of State action, except on a few narrow and indecisive fronts. The time has come for those of us who are responsible for State affairs to stop thinking and talking in the hackneyed, nineteenth century notions of State rights.

What we need is a master plan of working federalism which will give expression to the most effective capacities of both the States and the Federal Government. Such a plan could, in principle, stake out the appropriate areas of policy determination for our various States.

If the past is to teach us anything, it is that the present hit-or-miss alteration of fiscal resources results in the compensating expenditures of the Federal Government being offset in large part by a necessary reduction in State and local expenditures in time of economic depression.

WOULD HAVE STATE COLLECT

The whole idea that there is something mysteriously more competent about the Federal Government pervades much of the thinking directed toward simplification of tax administration. We are told time and again that the Federal Government should collect one tax or another and remit to the States their respective shares.

Speaking for New Jersey, we would be very glad to reverse this emphasis with respect to Federal excise taxes. Not only are we ready and able, with interstate cooperation, to collect such taxes as the alcoholic-beverage tax and to remit the Federal share to the Federal Government but we are ready and able to do so with less red tape and at decidedly less cost. We could operate similarly with pay-roll taxes.

I submit that the trend toward greater centralization will continue unabated, regardless of the party in power, until the States demonstrate a capacity to undertake common problems from a reasonably consistent point of view.

It is to the end of developing such a capacity that I have urged upon you the creating of facilities through which to arrive at a concordance of viewpoints, so far as possible, among our States.

ATTITUDE OF BRITISH GOVERNMENT TOWARD RESISTANCE MOVEMENT IN PALESTINE

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I note in the New York Times a dispatch from London which states that the British Government has again directed the attention of our State Department to advertisements in United States newspapers soliciting funds for the support of the resistance movement in Palestine. A Foreign Office spokesman was quoted as saying that the British Ambassador in Washington has seen Secretary Byrnes to express British concern over the advertising campaign which was critical of British policy in Palestine and sympathetic to the Hebrew patriots who are fighting for Palestine independence.

I also note, Mr. President, that the British Government has announced that military authorities were preparing the strongest offensive in modern Palestine's history in order to crush what they term an open rebellion by the underground forces. All branches of Britain's army in the Holy Land, estimated in excess of a hundred thousand men, are to take part in these operations. Troops from Egypt are said to be reaching the Holy Land daily by road and by rail as reinforcements.

Asked whether the United States State Department would be informed if these large-scale operations were put into effect, the Foreign Office spokesmen indicated that there would be no occasion to inform the American authorities of such developments. In other words, Mr. President, in the eyes of the British Government it is none of America's business what the British military authorities do in connection with their responsibility as the mandatary, notwithstanding the fact that a solemn treaty exists between the United States and Great Britain with respect thereto. At the same time, the British Government regards it as a matter of great concern to them that American citizens exercise the right of free speech and free press to express their sympathy for a much persecuted and long-suffering people in their fight against oppression.

For my part, Mr. President, I am on occasion, pro-British and, on occasion, anti-British. I am pro-British when Great Britain acts in fairness and in justice. I am anti-British when Great Britain violates the principles of fairness and justice. In this instance I think the attitude of the British Government violates those principles in both announcements. I am exceedingly anxious that the British Government recognize, first, that Americans are intensely concerned in any measure which Great Britain might adopt to suppress civil liberties in Palestine and to impose upon the citizens of that country restrictions inconsistent with the principles of English and American law; second, that Americans will exercise freely their right to adjudge the justice of resistance to British rule or influence in any part of the world, and that we will lend our moral assistance to any cause which we think is right and just.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an Associated Press dispatch from London dated January 6, published in the Washington Star of January 6, 1947.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH MOBILIZE TROOPS TO CRUSH PALESTINE REVOLT—ALL HOLY LAND FORCES WILL TAKE PART IN DRIVE ON EXTREMISTS

LONDON, January 6.—Government sources said today British military authorities were preparing the biggest offensive in modern Palestine's history to crush what they called the open rebellion against law and order by Jewish extremists.

All branches of Britain's Army in the Holy Land, estimated to total about 100,000 men, will take part, these sources said. Troops from Egypt are reaching the Holy Land by road and rail as reinforcements.

The trigger for the operation is expected to be British Cabinet ratification of proposals formulated in conferences among Palestine's high commissioner, Gen. Sir Alan Cunningham, Field Marshal Lord Montgomery, Prime Minister Attlee, Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin, and Colonial Secretary Arthur Creech Jones.

The informants said the British Government took the view that whatever settlement finally emerged for Palestine, the reimposition of law and order was Britain's first obligation.

NO POINT IN INFORMING UNITED STATES

Asked whether the United States State Department would be informed if large-scale operations were put into effect, a Foreign Office spokesman said:

"There would be no advantage in informing the American authorities of whatever day-to-day measures we may be contemplating for the Holy Land."

A final decision on Palestine's fate also may come from Britain this week. The possibilities include:

1. A partition plan for the Holy Land, which would create independent Arab and Jewish states there.

2. Considered a last-resort solution, British surrender of the League of Nations mandate to the United Nations.

UNITED NATIONS RATIFICATION NECESSARY

Whatever solution is finally adopted, with or without Arab and Jewish consent, Government sources said the United Nations would have to ratify the new arrangement.

The Arab League said yesterday its seven member nations would be represented at a conference on Palestine scheduled to start here January 21 under sponsorship of Britain, which governs the Holy Land by mandate.

At the same time, Haganah, relatively moderate Jewish underground defense organization, broadcast from Palestine a secret radio plea for an end to violence and professed knowledge that the British Government just now is preparing a solution of the Palestine problem.

JEWS STILL HAVE NOT ACCEPTED

The Jews, however, still have not accepted an invitation to the London conference. The World Zionist Organization voted in Basel, Switzerland, December 24, not to participate under existing circumstances but left the final decision up to its general council if a change should take place in the situation.

The Arab League's decision to come to London was made public by Secretary-General Abdel Rahman Azzam Pasha in Cairo. He said League delegates would demand an independent Arab government in Palestine and oppose any partition scheme or further Jewish immigration.

The League represents Egypt, Syria, Trans-Jordan, Iraq, Saudi-Arabia, Lebanon, and Yemen. Yesterday's announcement came in the face of a Christmas plea by the Palestine Arab executive committee that the League boycott the conference unless Britain invited Haj Amin el Husseini, exiled Mufti of Jerusalem, and agreed to discuss Arab independence.

PRESS URGES STRONG MEASURES

London newspapers, meanwhile, demanded strong measures to end violence in the Holy Land. The Sunday Dispatch called for all-out methods, the Sunday Times for sterner, direct methods against the terrorists themselves. The News of the World, declaring Britain needed more practical support from the United States, said the fact of news in New York State seemed to color the view of the White House.

In its broadcast, Haganah blamed Irgun Zvai Leumi and the so-called Stern Gang, extremist Jewish underground groups, for recent attacks on British troops. Its announcer said Haganah would not allow Zionist work all over Palestine and the hopes of a Jewish nation to be destroyed.

Irgun Zvai Leumi, however, in another underground radio broadcast, said flame throwers would be used further against the British, as they were last Thursday. The broadcaster listed British casualties in Thursday attacks as one officer killed and 20 soldiers and 5 policemen wounded. He said underground casualties were only two wounded. He reported the flamethrowers were converted fruit-tree sprayers.

TRAFFIC BLOCKED BY BLAST

Meanwhile, traffic was stopped by the blasting of a deep hole in a highway north of Rehoboth, and a police guard chased off a group that fired at the Hadera station of the Haifa-Tantura railway. No casualties were reported from either incident.

The Government announced 33 arrests, 4 of them women in searches in Hadera and Kafar Atta, north of Haifa, and confirmed the tightening of Palestine Jewish and Arab newspaper censorship in the previous 24 hours to avoid heightening already tense public feeling. The censorship does not apply to news sent abroad.

In Egypt 11 British soldiers were hurt, 2 dangerously, in a hand-grenade attack near Benha, 25 miles north of Cairo, on a train traveling toward Palestine. Unknown assailants threw two or three grenades into one of several troop coaches in the passenger train and one grenade exploded.

On the Mediterranean island of Cyprus some 10,000 Jews were being moved from temporary quarters at Caraolos internment camp to a new winter settlement of Nissen huts on the coast of Xylotymbou. They still will be behind barbed wire and under armed guard. They were taken off ships on which they tried to enter Palestine in defiance of British immigration quotas.

RECENT AIR-TRAVEL FATALITIES

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Members of the Senate and the people of the United States must in the last few months have been startled by and must now be deeply concerned in the apparently increasing number of fatalities in air travel. Fatalities have been so numerous and the crashes have been so frequent that, as I am advised today, travel by air in the United States seems to have been discouraged.

Mr. President, when it was my privilege to write the 1938 aviation law, which is now the law governing civil aviation, there was placed in the law, after long study, a provision for an independent safety board. That was not done haphazardly. It was done after receiving the advice and counsel of the best minds of the country. It was done against some opposition, but it was placed in the law in a very effective manner. The President of the United States, under a reorganization act, took it upon himself to change the aviation act of 1938 and in the reorganization which followed his advisers prevailed upon him, against the advice of others, to eliminate from the law the Independent Safety Board.

Mr. President, with every ounce of energy I possessed at that time I opposed the approval of that reorganization act, one reason being the elimination of the Independent Safety Board. This body thought differently, and by a divided vote approved the Reorganization Act. But from that day until now—and especially now—crashes and fatalities in the air, in my judgment—and I speak from a careful study and observation of the subject—have been traceable directly or indirectly to the absence of the Independent Safety Board. Many of the crashes which have taken place would not have occurred if there had been an Independent Safety Board. I have in mind the crash which took the life of one Member of this body, the late Senator Lundeen. The accident happened in Virginia. There is no question in my mind that if a safety board had existed at that time that plane, with its load of human beings, would not have been permitted to leave the airport. Its condition at the time did not warrant its leaving the field.

The first bill which was introduced in the Senate in this session, Senate bill 1, is a bill to rewrite almost the entire aviation law, and to incorporate into it the results of observation, training, and experience since 1938. The committee to which that bill has been referred, and which will study it, may possibly deem it necessary to give longer study to the bill, because it is voluminous. There is in that bill a provision for the reestablishment of the Independent Safety Board.

Thinking, perchance, that the committee might deem it necessary to take a longer time to make a study of the entire bill, I am today introducing as a separate bill, to be considered by the committee, a portion of Senate bill 1, with the hope that we may, in a shorter time than would be necessary to study the whole subject, have a favorable report from the committee and reestablish by law the Independent Safety Board.

I send the bill to the desk for appropriate reference.

The bill (S. 269) to create an Independent Air Safety Board was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I believe that all of us who have heard of the terrible disasters resulting from airplane crashes during late months sense the importance of the subject matter and the necessity for early attention by Members of the Senate.

For 2 days during the past week members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the Senate have been in conference with members of the Civil Aeronautics Board, and there has been a very thorough discussion of the whole subject matter. There has been discussion of the causes which have led up to these disasters, so far as they could be ascertained. As a result I was authorized by the committee to appoint a subcommittee, and I have done so, naming the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] chairman of a subcommittee of five. My colleague seemed the natural selection, because of the long study he has given to the problems of aviation and the intimate knowledge he has, both of domestic and international questions arising in this field of activity.

That committee has had referred to it Senate bill 1 and Senate bill 3. It is anticipated that from time to time legislation dealing with the problem of safety in the air will be referred to that subcommittee. I take it the subcommittee will promptly organize, that hearings will be begun, and that a thorough and painstaking study will be made of all that is involved in the situation, so far as investigation can disclose.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. Before I yield to the junior Senator from Maine I should like to say that for some time in the past I had the privilege of serving with him on the Committee on Commerce. The selection of the junior Senator from Maine to be chairman of the subcommittee is a most commendable selection, and I am indeed glad that he has been selected, because he has given time and study to the subject, and has devoted his fine intelligence and experience to it.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield the floor.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I should like to have the RECORD clearly show that I asked the Senator from Nevada to yield before he laid these flowers on my desk. I rose for the purpose of naming the members of the subcommittee associated with me in the inquiry. They are the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HAWKES], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]. The subcommittee promptly organized this morning, and will proceed as rapidly as possible.

I wish at this point to express the profound regret of all those interested in the great aviation industry at this very critical time that circumstances made it impossible for the Senator from Nevada to continue as a member of the committee having jurisdiction, as his interest during the past decade has been one of the most outstanding contributions to the progress of aviation. It is a matter of gratification that his activity in introducing proposed legislation indicates that his interest will continue, although he is not a member of the committee immediately concerned. I am sure that his assistance will be most helpful to the committee and to the country.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I think it appropriate to add that one of the four technical assistants which the committee was authorized to appoint has already been selected. He is an authority in the aviation field, and he has been assigned to work with the new subcommittee.

CONTINUATION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE NATIONAL DEFENSE PROGRAM

The Senate resumed consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 46) continuing the authority for the investigation of the national defense program.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, is it in order to speak on the pending resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out lines 12 and 13 and to insert in lieu thereof the following: "defense program); is hereby continued during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eightieth Congress (except as hereinafter provided): Provided, That on and after the date this resolution is agreed to, the authority contained in such Senate Resolution 71 shall be limited, with respect to the subject matter authorized to be studied and investigated therein, to excessive profits, fraud, corruption, waste, extravagance, mismanagement, incompetence, and inefficiency in expenditures, connected with the prosecution of the national defense program for World War II: Provided further, That the foregoing authority shall be further limited to transactions which occurred within the United States (including Hawaii, Alaska, Panama, and Puerto Rico) prior to June 30, 1946: Provided further, That the committee shall report to the Senate the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations, as soon as practicable, but in no event later than January 31, 1948, at which time all powers and duties conferred upon the committee shall terminate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate for a few moments in relation to the pending resolution, Senate Resolution 46, which brings definitely into focus one's position in relation to the La Follette-Monroney Reorganization Act, concerning which I have previously stated as follows:

First. This law was not meant as a strait-jacket to limit the functions of Congress.

Second. Even if it were conceived as such—which I doubt—the law itself would have no binding effect upon the present Congress unless the Congress gave it such effect.

Third. This Congress cannot pass the buck to any past Congress or any future Congress. If, in the interest of the public, it is thought necessary to continue the War Investigating Committee, then this Congress should have the vision and the judgment to do what is needed.

Fourth. I believe that the present standing committees, which are 15 in number, have plenty to do to attend to their present and prospective knitting. I am sure that is true of the Judiciary Committee because there have been added to it the many new functions of protection of trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies; patents, copyrights, and trademarks; immigration and naturalization; claims against the United States; and so forth.

THE ISSUE

The issue to me is very simple. If I feel, as I do, that the public interest will be best served by having the old special committee continued, then it is up to me to so cast my vote. If I felt that any of the regular committees created by the La Follette-Monroney Act were specially constituted for looking into the past with its waste and criminal negligence and could do it more efficiently than this War Investigating Committee, then I would not vote for the continuance of that committee.

The resolution contemplates that we continue this very effective congressional instrument for 1 year. I believe that the resolution, besides coinciding with my present judgment, expresses the will of the people. The people want the Congress to find out if their servants in the past have been faithful servants. If not, these servants must be held to account.

The fine work of the committee in the past justifies its continuance. If one has a good tool and a job to do, he does not throw that tool away and start the work anew with a blunted tool.

But let us not fall into the rut of worshiping mere mechanisms. After all, what we want is results. I know that the public has been sold and oversold on the miraculous structure of the Reorganization Act. But we who are now operating under it are finding that after all it is the working ability of the men that counts, and not the structure.

The resolution now before the Senate really challenges the reason and the judgment of each one of us in that we will have to decide whether we are going to place a road-block on the way to finding out about waste and corruption, or whether we are going to remove that road-block. America knows that this committee is not on a witch hunt, but that the purpose of the committee is to learn from the past how to avoid waste and corruption so that in case we have another challenge to our national life, we can avoid those pitfalls.

I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. TYDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BUCK] is necessarily absent.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] is detained on public business.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am sending to the desk, and shall ask the clerk to read immediately, a proposed substitute for the so-called Brewster amendment, using the exact words of the Brewster amendment as it has been presented but providing that the investigation shall be conducted by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, rather than by a special committee created by the Senate.

I ask the clerk to read the amendment which I now offer as a substitute for the Brewster amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland in the nature of a substitute for the Brewster amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "hereby," in line 3 of the Brewster amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "transferred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eightieth Congress (except as hereinafter provided): Provided, That on and after the date this resolution is agreed to, the authority contained in such Senate Resolution 71 shall be limited, with respect to the subject matter authorized to be studied and investigated therein, to excessive profits, fraud, corruption, waste, extravagance, mismanagement, incompetence, and inefficiency in expenditures, connected with the prosecution of the national defense program for World War II: Provided further, That the foregoing authority shall be further limited to transactions which occurred within the United States (including Hawaii, Alaska, Panama, and Puerto Rico) prior to June 30, 1946: Provided further, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments shall report to the Senate the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations, as soon as practicable, but in no event later than January 31, 1948."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Maryland, if he will permit, that inasmuch as, with the exception of the first two lines, the language is identical, instead of offering it as a substitute, it be offered as an amendment to strike out and insert.

Mr. TYDINGS. As a perfecting amendment. I think that would be preferable.

So we have the issue drawn in almost affirmative terms. The amendment which the Senate has just heard read is, with the exception of the name of the committee, verbatim the words of the original Brewster resolution. There is not a change of a comma, a semicolon, or a word in it. The sole question remaining before the Senate is not whether there shall be an investigation or whether there shall not be an investigation, as has been implied heretofore, but whether or not a committee of this body which is already charged with performing this very specific kind of work shall perform it, or whether the Senate shall throw that committee overboard and appoint an entirely new committee to do the work of the committee which the Senate has already constituted to perform such functions.

More than that, Mr. President, who constitutes the membership of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments? Listen to the personnel:

On the majority side: GEORGE D. AIKEN, of Vermont, chairman; HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan.

Pausing at the reading of the second name, one of the members of the so-called special committee, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] is already a member of the standing committee which would be charged to perform this service.

Next, BOURKE B. HICKENLOOPER, of Iowa. I do not recall at the moment whether Senator HICKENLOOPER was on the original Truman committee, but I know that he has been on numerous investigating committees, and is an able Senator and an able investigator.

JOHN W. BRICKER, of Ohio; EDWARD J. THYE, of Minnesota; JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin; and IRVING M. IVES, of New York. On the Democratic side the members are JOHN L. MCCLELLAN, of Arkansas; JAMES O. EASTLAND, of Mississippi; CLYDE R. HOEY, of North Carolina; GLEN H. TAYLOR, of Idaho; A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, of Virginia; and HERBERT R. O'CONOR, of Maryland.

I should like to ask the Republican members of this committee, and also the Democratic members, if they feel incompetent to do this work. I shall pause for a reply, if any of them see fit to answer the question.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the Senator please repeat the question? I was so busy reading the amendment that I did not hear the question.

Mr. TYDINGS. The question was this: I read the membership of the committee, and I stated that the only reason I could see for taking away from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments the function for which it was created, and lodging it in a special committee, would be that the members of the standing committee felt incompetent to do the job.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, all I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Maryland at this time, inasmuch as I have not even had an opportunity to read his amendment, is that I feel that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments does have a very strong personnel. I am sure it would not shirk any duty which devolved upon it. But beyond that, I do not care to commit myself until I have an opportunity to read and analyze the amendment which the Senator from Maryland has offered; and that may take me some time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont is very fair about that, and I do not think he ought to be asked peremptorily. I asked the question only by way of illustrating the absolutely childish situation into which the Senate has maneuvered itself. Two weeks ago or less, the Senate created 15 standing committees; it assigned to each committee certain very definite functions, and then decided on the personnel committee. Furthermore, experts and this and that are to be furnished each committee. Now, however, the Senate is about to say, "Yes; it is true we have created a Standing Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and have put fine and able men on it, and one of its functions is to investigate all expenditures in the departments of the Government; but we are not going to use that committee. We are going to set up an entirely new committee, not the old Truman committee, per se, but we shall use some of the old members of that committee, and shall set up a new committee to do the work with which the standing committee is specifically charged."

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator from Maryland has made some remarks which I did not fully follow; but when he was discussing the Committee on the Expenditures in the Executive Departments it occurred to me that in the past such a committee has been charged with the investigation of expenditures in the executive branch of the Government. When he read the membership of that committee, I observed that on the Republican side there are four Senators who have been governors of their States and are thoroughly familiar with expenditures on the executive side, and on the Democratic side of the committee there are two Senators who also have been governors of their States.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Perhaps I rose prematurely. I was going to correct the Senator from New Mexico by saying that of the 13 members of the standing committee 6 have been governors of their States. However, he has brought out that fact himself.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator.

Now, Mr. President, I ask Senators to listen to these words before they cast their votes on this important question. What is the work of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments—to consist of 13 Senators, to which committee shall be referred all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the following subjects—

What are the following subjects? They are these, among others:

Studying the operation of Government activities at all levels with a view to determining its economy and efficiency.

Mr. TOBEY rose.

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TOBEY. This matter is new to me, but I should like to propound a question to the author of this perfecting amendment. As I heard it read I came to the conclusion—and I ask the Senator please to confirm whether I am correct in that judgment—that the effect of the amendment, if adopted, would be that the Senate of the United States would live up to the letter and spirit of the Reorganization Act, as it was passed by the Senate last August? Is that correct?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. TOBEY. And more than that, that all experts and investigators who now are a part and parcel of any special committee bearing on this investigation could readily be made available and transferred, to report to and work through and under the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Is that correct?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. TOBEY. So there would be no loss in efficiency, but the great gain would be made that the Senate of the United States would be living up to the Reorganization Act, in its letter and spirit, as it passed it and sent it to the House of Representatives. Is that correct?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from New Hampshire is correct. I may add to what he has said—and I say this not with the desire to asperse anyone or to attribute to anyone motives which he probably did not have when the original Brewster resolution was submitted—that if the Senate should not accept the amendment offered by me, which confers this power on a standing committee recently created in this body, the Senate in effect would insult every Member, Democratic and Republican, of that standing committee, because the Senate would then say, in effect, that they are incompetent to do the work.

Mr. TOBEY. In other words, it would be a reflection on the standing committee, would it not?

Mr. TYDINGS. If I were a member of the standing committee I would feel that it would be a reflection; and I cannot see how any member, Republican or Democratic, of that committee who might vote against my amendment could be considered as saying other than that, "I feel incompetent to do the work for which that committee was created and which it is charged with doing."

Mr. TOBEY. I concur.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, there is the issue. No longer is there any debate on whether there shall be an investigation or shall not be an investigation. All the oratory which has attributed bad faith to some of those who were opposing the resolution now goes out the window. There will be an investigation. It will be conducted exactly within the purview of the language offered by the Senator from Maine, and it will be conducted by a committee which is preponderantly Republican, and upon which one of the outstanding investigators, a former member of the Truman committee, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] will serve as a member.

Mr. President, what excuse is left now for the creation of a new committee, when we have already in being a committee which is equipped and set up to discharge this very function?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SALTONSTALL in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I simply wish to point out to the Senator from Maryland that the attitude the minority or those of us who feel as he does about this matter have taken today in supporting his position is not a new attitude at all. It is an attitude which we took in the Rules Committee when this matter was first broached. I think the country should know, as the Senator from Maryland has so clearly stated, that the Members on this side of the aisle are not opposed to any investigation of any crook, no matter where he may reside or who he may be.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator has ably stated the case. Let me add, by way of an appendix to his remarks, that the Truman committee itself was created by the present President of the United States, then sitting in this body; and the investigations authorized then were approved by a Democratic majority then existing in this body; and the committee did not hesitate, regardless of its political affiliation, to bring to light anything that was regarded as unseemly or improper, so that it might be corrected. So the whole genesis of the investigation was in the Democratic Party.

Mr. President, now that the amendment is offered by this side, and inasmuch as the only difference proposed by the amendment is that a standing committee of this body, created to do this very job, shall do it, I cannot see how, in the public interest, aside from every other consideration, Members of the Senate on either side of the aisle can now go back on their own child and can adopt a foster child, of somewhat bastard parentage, to do the work involved in this kind of legitimate undertaking.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The point has been made by the able Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] and the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] that the only real difference as between the standing committee and the special committee has to do with the question of experience. I wish to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Michigan, a member of the present Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program, is also a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and I say that with all due deference to the other members of the committee that he has been the spearhead in investigatory work and has vast experience in investigating matters of the character we are discussing.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Michigan was put on the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments by our colleagues on the other side for the very proper reason that there is no more able investigator and overseer of Government activities in this body than is the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I was somewhat interested in the Senator's comment on this measure being of bastard parentage, which is rather strong language on this floor, particularly as the origin of the special committee was in the gentleman who is now President of the United States. I feel confident that the Senator did not intend to reflect upon his parentage of the committee.

The Senator has repeatedly referred to the committee as a new committee, although I think everyone else in this Chamber and in the country knows that it is not a new committee, but is a continuation, as the resolution clearly provides, of a committee which has been in existence for 4 years, and concerning whose work the country is quite familiar.

As to its bastard parentage, I am a little interested in the origin of the Reorganization Act which the Senator so eloquently espouses, as there would be some ground for argument as to the parentage of that act, particularly as Senators on the other side have been beating their breasts so vehemently, not regarding the letter of the act, as they are quite careful not to mention the letter of the act, which clearly leaves ample scope for action of the character proposed, but they constantly refer to the spirit of the act, and what it was intended to do. When they emphasize the spirit, it means they lose sight of the letter and decline to depend on the letter.

Who is most competent to interpret this act? I think it would be profitable to call attention to the debates and the votes in this body on June 10, 1946, when the Reorganization Act was debated and decision was reached, in the determination at this time as to the parentage of the Reorganization Act, and to whom the child belonged. We find that 17 Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber, on my left, were absent at the time, not sufficiently interested, or not able to be present for undoubtedly adequate reasons, and 13 Members on the other side voted against the adoption of the Reorganization Act, with the spirit of which they are now so much concerned

When I turn to this side of the Chamber, I find that 23 of the votes that adopted the act came from the Republican side, and that there were only 3 votes on this side against it.

So, it seems to me, while Senators on the other side exhibit great concern regarding the spirit of the act, it is perhaps true that this child is far more the child of this side than of the other side of the Chamber. Whether for that reason it is proper to charge it with bastardy I do not know, but, at any rate, it is our child, we are proud of it, and I think we are more competent to interpret the spirit as well as the letter of the act, for whose existence upon the statute books this side of the Chamber is primarily responsible.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator for making one of the best arguments in support of the proposal I have offered that I expected to hear on this floor. He has just said that his side voted 23 to 3, as I recall, for the adoption of the Reorganization Act. I am wondering if Senators on the other side will vote 50 to 0 against their own baby which the Senator from Maine so eloquently claims they fathered.

Mr. TOBEY and Mr. BREWSTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield first to the Senator from New Hampshire, and then I shall yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. TOBEY. I merely wish to propound a question to my friend and colleague, the Senator from Maine. Referring to the 23 Republicans who voted for the bill, was the Senator from Maine one of the number?

Mr. BREWSTER. I will verify it. I am very sure I was. [After a pause.] I find I was one of those not voting.

[Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DONNELL. I make the point of order that the Senate is not in order due to the noise and confusion in the galleries, and I ask the Chair respectfully to notify the occupants of the galleries of the stringent rule of this body with respect to the maintenance of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's point of order is well taken. The Chair respectfully asks the visitors in the galleries to refrain from applause or noise of any character.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like to know why the occupants of the gallery should be blamed for the hilarity in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think there is force in my assertion that the 23 Republicans who made it possible for the act to be passed are certainly better qualified to interpret its spirit than are the very considerable number on the opposite side who voted against it, or were included with myself among those who were absent. It may be said, however, that I have been quoted on this floor as one of those who testified concerning this matter before the special committee by whose activities alone the act came into being, in favor of steps along this line. I think my remarks upon this subject have been rather voluminously quoted on both sides of the Chamber in the discussions which have proceeded hitherto. So that there is no need of any doubt in the RECORD about my position before and after the passage of the act.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. In just a moment. Again I must say that the remarks of my good friend and colleague, the Senator from Maine, are somewhat shot through with sophistry. He says that those who voted for the act should be in a better position to interpret whether it applies or does not apply to the particular situation we are discussing than those on this side who perchance may have opposed it. Incidentally I am one of the Senators who voted for it; but if the Senator's argument is sound, then by the logic of what he says he should be the last man in the world to ask for a special committee to be set up, because he was not present, and he had a position on neither one side nor the other of the proposition. Yet if his proposal is adopted, he would head the committee, and he certainly would not be one of those who would be in a position to interpret the act, according to his own definite statement.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I do not know as to the position of any of the other Senators who were absent on the day when the vote was taken, but, as I have previously stated, my own record in the matter is fully apparent in the hearings before the special committee which considered this subject, before whom I testified at some length, and, as I have said, quotations from what I said have been embodied in the record of the present debate. Whether or not that would permit me to participate in the parentage of the act, at any rate, it leaves no doubt as to what my consistent position has been.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is only byplay.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I shall yield later, but I should like to develop a point or two. However, the Senator from Nebraska has always been courteous to me, and I yield to him.

Mr. WHERRY. I merely wish to suggest to the able Senator from Maryland, who, I know always wants to be fair, that on the day the vote was taken, as I was the one charged with the duty of making announcements, I announced that the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] was not present on that occasion, and that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS. There is no question about that.

Mr. WHERRY. One more matter. I voted with the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Undoubtedly the Senator did.

Mr. WHERRY. We were on the same side respecting the issue before us. I think the distinguished Senator from Maryland will agree with me that no one has been more persistent in seeking to eliminate the use of borrowed clerical help in connection with special committees than I have. Does the Senator agreed with me in that?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not familiar with the Senator's record in that regard, but I am sure that if he makes the statement it is accurate.

Mr. WHERRY. As one who voted with the Senator, after the colloquy was engaged in between Senator La Follette and several others, Senator La Follette, who was the Senate proponent of the measure, said the provision was not a bar to special committees, if the Senate felt they should be constituted. I think the distinguished Senator from Maryland will remember that. So that I think when we voted for the Reorganization Act, we did so with the full knowledge that if 15 committees did not accomplish the purpose, and it was the opinion of the majority of the Senate that special committees should be set up, the Senate would have the right to create them.

I for one do not consider it a violation of the act if a committee that cuts across these lines is proposed, and I would support the creation of such a committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should say, though, that it is a very unusual procedure for the majority within a week to set up two committees to do the same thing.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am very anxious to proceed.

Mr. WHERRY. But the Senator from Maryland is making statements on the floor which I think should be answered. I think he should not cut me off from an observation.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Nebraska can have his time.

Mr. WHERRY. I can make a speech in my time; yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to be courteous to the Senator. I thought he had concluded his point.

Mr. WHERRY. I have not concluded.

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to him, to enable him to conclude his point.

Mr. WHERRY. The point is, there is nothing unusual about this proposal. It conforms to all the precedents of the Senate. There is nothing unusual about the procedure. Since an interval will elapse before the standing committee can be completely organized and staffed, with due respect to its ability, and acknowledging that it is composed of men just as able as those on any other committee, I ask the distinguished Senator from Maryland, who is always fair, if he does not feel that, considering the set-up of the present special committee and the information it has, it would be advisable for the special committee to continue?

Mr. TYDINGS. It is the first time in my service here that I have ever known of a proposal to create two committees in 2 weeks to do the same job.

I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I have a fair memory, and in the particular statement I am about to make it is very distinct. Referring to the colloquy that has just ensued, I point out to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] that as he remembers, no doubt, he and I were both members of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. TOBEY. I have a very distinct recollection—I like to recall it; I have, repeatedly, since then—that in one of the last meetings of that committee, which passed out of existence last year, my friend the Senator from Nebraska told me with great earnestness that he was opposed to any special committees and they ought to be discontinued.

Referring to remarks by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] which he just made, I now read, if I may, from an address or a speech which I delivered here last Monday, in which I gave citations to remarks in the committee hearings made by various Members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle in connection with the passage of the reorganization bill.

I quote from my remarks of last Monday:

> The junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] said that it was archaic and grotesque to continue the conditions then prevailing in the operations of the Senate.
> He referred to the confusion and overlapping in the jurisdiction of Senate committees. He said that special committees have been used to correct this condition, and then added:
> "I do not think we can rely indefinitely on this creation of special committees."
> He emphasized particularly the necessity of adequately staffing the standing committees, since without such staffing it becomes easier to seek the creation of special committees.
> That staffing, I interpolate, was provided.
> The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 addressed itself specifically to the problems of providing a substantial staff for each standing committee. The Senator from Maine told the joint committee considering this legislation of the grave dangers which will increasingly arise unless Congress adequately staffs its standing committees.

The perfecting amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland transfers the investigatory work heretofore performed by the special committee to the standing committee, thereby conforming to the spirit and letter of the reorganization bill as it passed the Senate.

I may say further, in contradistinction to the statement just made by my good friend from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], that the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, headed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], is already organized and eager to begin its work. Let us give it a chance.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I like to be courteous, but I have practically made no argument at all thus far along the lines I intended to develop for the reason that we have had a good deal of good-humored by-play. I should like to address myself seriously to this question. If the Senator from Nebraska will bear with me a while, I will yield to him a little later. I should like to emphasize the thought that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments was created for the very purpose embodied in the pending resolution. Indeed, the language of the Reorganization Act itself says so, for the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments was created for the purpose of studying the operations of Government activities at all levels, with a view of determining their economy and efficiency.

There are many other functions specifically conferred on it, but I have read only that one. What caused me, the first day it came up, reluctantly to challenge the resolution of the Senator from Maine was that the resolution encompassed everything. Under it the committee could have investigated the State Department, the War Department, the Navy Department, the Commerce Department, the Interior Department, and the armed services abroad. It could have investigated the consulates, and all the independent agencies of the Government; indeed, it had no limitations worthy of the name. So when I pointed out this fact to the Senator from Maine, he came before the Armed Services Committee, and there I suggested to him—I hope I use my exact words—that he would reduce the area of hostility to his resolution if he would confine it to graft, corruption, and so forth, with reference to war contracts, not that I would be for it then, but that at least it would have more merit than if it authorized an investigation of anything the Senator might have in mind.

Mr. BREWSTER rose.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not yield for the moment. I will in a moment.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator's statement——

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not yielded.

The reason I did that was that I had been interested in some of the newspaper reports of statements attributed to the Senator during the past 2 or 3 months. He had said that he was going to investigate the armed services in Europe. He had said he was going to investigate certain diplomatic propositions, as I understood, in South America. He had covered many fields that had nothing to do with graft or corruption or war contracts direct, so that it looked to me as if we would be letting the bars down for everything.

Mr. BREWSTER rose.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield in a minute, but let me finish. I have not concluded.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator's statements are so much at variance——

Mr. TYDINGS. No; but just let me read. I have in my hand the 40 or 50 questions which the Senator's committee—and I understand he himself—directed to the War and Navy Departments, and I should like to read some of the things that the committee said it wanted the War and Navy Departments to provide, for example:

1. Information on the American Army program for demilitarization of Germany and a comparison of that program with the demilitarization programs for Germany made by the other three allies.

2. Full details of the organization of the military government in the British, French, and Russian zones.

3. The relationship between the military government of each of our three allies and their respective national governments.

What I am reading are matters addressed by the Senator from Maine to the War Department, and I want the Senate to know what the special committee intended to look into just a few months ago.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. As soon as I finish reading.

Mr. FERGUSON. I should like to find out who submitted the questions, and the date that they were submitted.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will give that information, but I will go back and get it from the desk after I have finished reading it, and put it in at the end:

4. The extent to which authority has been delegated to the United States military governor and to the military governors of our three allies, and a comparison of the two.

5. The estimates of the annual total cost of operation of military government for each of the fiscal years of 1947 and 1948, together with a break-down showing the larger items in each year and an explanation of the methods by which those figures are arrived at.

6. The relationship between the military governor and the deputy military governor, together with all documents bearing on that subject.

7. The consolidation of the military government of the United States with the military government for Germany as a whole.

8. The consolidation of the Berlin and Frankfort offices of the American Army and the American Government.

26. A biographical sketch of present and former personnel employed in the largest division of the American military government in Germany, from the highest position to as low as section chief. A specification of many types of details to be provided in each biographical sketch.

27. The present status of the demilitarization program in the American zone in Germany, including details with respect to the method for dismantling plants, a list of those dismantled, the value of those plants, the apportionment of costs of dismantling and shipment, the method of appraising the value of plants, etc.

29. Full details on the subject of the liquidation of the war potential, both in the American zone and in the zones of our allies, with particular reference to the subject of quadripartite inspection of such liquidation.

33. The types of agencies which furnish information to him.

34. The agency which is primarily responsible in collecting and preparing information for him. A list of the other agencies which are used for this purpose, together with samples of the kind of information they submit.

Mr. President, all these things are to be gone into by the committee whose function it is to investigate war expenditures, to hunt for graft, corruption, and waste.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not finished reading yet. Let me finish reading the list and then I will yield to the Senator.

35. Details on the coordination of the Counter-Intelligence Corps of the Army with military government.

36. The agencies responsible for gathering information on whether Germans are carrying out the orders of the American Army in Germany.

37. The exchange of information between the American Army in Germany and the armies of our allies.

41. Full discussion of the conduct of American troops in Germany, with particular emphasis on details from February 1 to October 1, 1946.

42. The relations between the office of intelligence in the American Army in Germany and other parts of the American military government in Germany.

The foregoing is only a partial list of the subjects of investigation of the American Army and of the War Department in Germany, as proposed by Senator BREWSTER'S special committee in October 1946, and as published by the Republican members of that committee in December 1946.

That is just a month ago.

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. I take it the able Senator from Maryland has read into the RECORD a questionnaire submitted by the counsel for the investigating committee which is the subject of our discussion. As I understand, the list of questions was prepared while the counsel for the committee, and some of his associates, were in Germany investigating the very matters that the committee, under the leadership of the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], was proposing to investigate.

I do not think anyone will deny that if the information sought in the list of questions had been obtained the committee would know a great deal more about the occupying force in Germany than it does today. I think the record ought to show clearly that the committee itself unanimously voted to look into the subject of the occupying troops in Germany, and at the time the committee so voted, it was unanimously of the opinion that the counsel for the committee should make the investigation which he made. The then chairman of the committee, the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] went to the White House and conferred with the President of the United States on this very subject. They discussed a specific program which was to be followed and the matters that were to be looked into, and the list read by the Senator from Maryland merely represents a carrying out of the program which the President of the United States discussed with the chairman of the committee, and approved, as to the matters which should be gone into. So as I see it now, the mere fact that the committee at the present day does not believe it should continue the investigation of the occupation forces in Germany does not mean that the committee was not justified in going into the subject when it did go into it last October and even prior thereto.

Mr. President, I returned to the Capital in the month of August of last year, and I remember that at that time the committee, then under the control of the Democratic majority, which is now the minority, was holding a conference or an executive session at which the Members were looking into this very matter. I think anyone who will read the record which was produced in that executive session will come to the conclusion that the time had then come when the Congress of the United States should look into the question of the occupation forces in Germany. I have not changed my mind in that respect one particle. I believe the matter should be looked into. But owing to changes which have occurred and different circumstances existing, I think that the investigating committee, if its life is to be extended for a year, can investigate what we have suggested as the proper subject for investigation, namely what occurred in connection with the war effort, the contracts which were entered into, the profiteering engaged in, and the corruption which resulted, so that in the future we will have some idea of the history of that phase of the war effort.

Oh, yes, it can be said that that is all spilled milk; but all history, as a matter of fact, is spilled milk. I think the Senate of the United States has a right to go into the question of what caused the spilling of the milk, so that in the future we may avoid such pitfalls. It has been said——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FERGUSON. I was very generous the other day in yielding.

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall be glad to yield further; but will the Senator allow me to interrupt him and point out that under my amendment the Senate could go into the question of spilled milk. There is not the slightest difference between the two proposals on the matter of going into the question of spilled milk. The only question is that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], in redrafting his amendment, has brushed aside all the questions which were formerly considered as appropriate for investigation, and has agreed that henceforth such investigations shall be undertaken by the Committee on Armed Services. By the same logic, the investigation of war frauds ought to be undertaken and concluded by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. The logic of one position brings us face to face with the logic of the other.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. If I thought for one moment that that committee was equipped at the present time, or in the near future could become equipped, with the knowledge which is necessary to do the job, I would say that it should undertake the investigation. It is not a question of waiving the jurisdiction of that committee. I will be just as jealous of the jurisdiction of that committee as is the able chairman, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN]. But I wish to repeat what I said the other day, that time is of the essence. If we spend the next year on this particular investigation, we shall be able to do a much better job than could the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. There are many side issues.

When I previously asked the Senator to yield I wished to discuss the question of the spirit of the act, because I think that is the red herring which is being drawn across the trail today, as it has been on previous days.

I was not present when the reorganization bill was voted upon in the Senate. I was in Bermuda on Senate business, and could not be present. It is a matter of record that I am registered as being in favor of the act. The RECORD shows that if I had been present at that time I would have voted "yea"; and I still feel the same way about it. However, I invite the attention of the Senate to something else in the act, which has greater force than what was taken out of the bill. Let me read it:

SEC. 101. The following sections of this title—

are enacted by the Congress:

(a) As an exercise of the rule-making power of the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, and as such they shall be considered as part of the rules of each House, respectively, or of that House to which they specifically apply; and such rules shall supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and—

This is very material—

(b) With full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules—so far as relating to the procedure in such House—at any time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

In other words, we have reserved to ourselves the right, at any time that circumstances should demand, to change these rules. I for one believe that at the present time it is necessary for the Senate to change the rule, even though it has been enacted. It is necessary to change the rule if we are to do this job now and do it thoroughly. As I have said many times, time is of the essence. The departments are being shrunk, and their files are being dissipated to the various archives. If we are to do this job, we must do it now.

We are not waiving the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Yesterday at our meeting I saw upon the desk of the chairman a pile of papers which will take weeks to digest. There will be work for every committee. If I did not believe that we should try to do this job through this particular committee, I would be urging that it be undertaken by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. But I believe that this job must be done if the people of the United States are to have an accounting of their funds in our war effort, if they are to look behind the shroud of secrecy and see what has taken place.

Therefore I again urge that, notwithstanding the fact that the Senate once voted for the idea that there should be no special committees, the Senate did not finally vote for the proposition. The act says:

With full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules (so far as relating to the procedure in such House) at any time, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

We now have the solemn duty and obligation to look the facts squarely in the face and decide what is best for the Nation. That is our duty.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Vermont. I hope that Senators to whom I yield—and I shall try to be as liberal as possible in yielding—will not occupy too much time.

Mr. AIKEN. I shall not take much of the Senator's time.

The Senator seems to have tossed a very large lighted firecracker into our midst. I admit that I should like to have a little more time to decide what to do about that firecracker.

I have the greatest respect for the earnestness and ability of the ranking member of my committee, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. I usually agree with what he says. However, I do not wish to concede that the committee of which I am chairman, which committee is composed of 12 able Members of the Senate in addition to myself, could not perform a duty such as that proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], if such duty were imposed upon it by the Senate.

As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, it would transfer to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments the staff—if we desire it—the files, the funds, and the authority of the existing War Investigating Committee. With the Senator from Michigan standing ready as a member of the committee to take the lead in continuing the investigation, I do not concede that we could not perform that duty. My committee will not dodge any duty which is placed upon it by the Senate. I do not yet know just how I shall vote on this question, but I do not admit that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments could not perform a duty required of it by the Senate if the Senate were to transfer to that committee all the means of performing that duty.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to yield to the Senator; but before he takes advantage of my yielding, I request that he make his remarks rather brief, because two other Senators have already consumed 15 minutes of my time. While I wish to be liberal, at some time during the afternoon I should like to pursue my own argument and state my own conclusions.

Mr. BREWSTER. The only reason I rose was in connection with certain statements and the use of my name. I know that the Senator from Maryland would wish to have the statements corrected. Otherwise, they would leave an unfortunate and erroneous impression.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. BREWSTER. I shall address myself only to that point.

I am sure it is generally understood by Members of the Senate that no question has been raised on this side of the aisle as to the competency of any committee or any Member to carry out any task.

Mr. TYDINGS. I disagree with the Senator on that point. Such questions have been raised on the other side of the aisle, by virtue of the submission of the pending resolution. It is argued that a standing committee could not do the job as well as could a special committee. So I must take issue with the Senator on that point. He has been making that argument, and so have the Senator from Michigan and other Senators during the past 3 or 4 days.

Mr. BREWSTER. I used the word "competency." As I have understood, it has been the contention of Senators who favor this resolution, not that any of the Senators who have been mentioned, or the Senator from Maryland, would not be competent—I have already had evidence of their celerity and intelligence—but that it is a matter of background and training, and the knowledge as to approximately 50,000 pages of record which have already been digested in the activities of the committee, which work would be continued. I do not mean to labor on the point; I merely desire to keep the record clear.

First, I should like to correct the statement as to what I said in recent months with regard to conducting investigations in Germany. The only thing which I have ever said in that regard was to concur with the distinguished chairman of the special committee when it was the Mead committee, in August and September, when the committee unanimously decided, after a 3-hour hearing, of an intelligence officer from Germany, that the investigation should be continued. I concurred.

Second, the Senator referred to the committee as the Brewster committee last fall. It was not the Brewster committee; it was the Kilgore committee. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] was chairman. He, following the decision of his predecessor, former Senator Mead, also decided that the committee should carry forward the investigation, and, after conferring with the President of the United States, sent the counsel of the committee to Germany with instructions.

The Senator referred to the questionnaire as a Brewster questionnaire, or made some reference of that character to it. The Senator from Maine never saw the questionnaire to which reference has been made. The questions were the result of instructions of the full committee as conveyed to the counsel by the distinguished chairman, the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator be good enough to name the full committee which approved the questionnaire?

Mr. BREWSTER. The full committee never approved the questionnaire. The questionnaire was made out in Germany after the counsel arrived there. The counsel had instructions when he went there. He had an agenda of eight or nine points which were discussed with the President, and he subsequently went over to carry on the investigation.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield long enough for me to explain how that questionnaire was made up after months of investigation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TYDINGS. I prefer not to yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I merely wanted to explain in a few sentences how this questionnaire was brought about. Will the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield, but this will be the last time.

Mr. BREWSTER. I should like to conclude, then, if I may, the correction. As I say, my knowledge is limited to what I have stated.

Finally, the Senator made reference to diplomatic inquiries in South America, which I am somewhat at a loss to understand. There has never been any suggestion in the committee, and, so far as I know, any inquiry on this subject other than what I referred to on the floor. My recent visit to South America had no connection whatsoever with the committee, either as to authority or expense, or any activities of the Senate. It was concerned with a matter which seemed to me very desirable to inform myself about on my own account, but it was in no sense as a member or as an official of the committee that I went. I should like that to be clear in the RECORD. My position as chairman of the committee has been a matter of only the past 2 weeks.

Mr. TYDINGS. I now yield to the Senator from Michigan; but I request most courteously that he be as brief as possible.

Mr. FERGUSON. I merely wish to say that it is my information that these questions were submitted by counsel to the military government in Germany after the counsel and his aides in Germany had proceeded with 8 or 10 days of investigation, and that the questions were a summary of the facts that had been related, so that we might get the answers directly from the War Department.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand that. Let me say, however, in contradistinction to the Senator from Maine, that I have in my hand a copy of the New York Times of November 26, 1946, containing an excerpt from an article by Mr. Felix Belair, dated Washington, November 25, The heading of the article is "Occupation study balked by Kilgore; Senator blocks vote on inquiry into military government of Germany, Austria."

The Senator from West Virginia, when I questioned him about this matter told me that due to the fact that a campaign was on, quite often he was the only Democrat present; several members of the opposite party were present; that the only thing he could do was to raise the question of the absence of a quorum in order to keep matters somewhat under control, and that he went to the President with some of these propositions, but I never understood him to tell me that the President approved them or that he either approved or disapproved them.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think the Senator is in error in his chronology. The original direction by the committee which was in September was unanimous and it was at that time that the Senator from West Virginia, with the counsel of the committee, having just taken charge of the committee following former Senator Mead, went to see the President and discussed the matter. The discussion was harmonious. Following that the counsel went to Germany, in October, during the campaign, with the understanding that following the election the committee would carry on the investigation. After the election there was a change of viewpoint, and it was during that time that opposition developed to the action of the committee, which resulted in the first divided vote it has ever had, when 6 to 4, all the committee members being recorded, it voted that it would not carry on the investigation in Germany at that time, although the Senator from West Virginia—and I think he would confirm this statement if he were here—indicated then that he hoped and expected that the investigation would be carried on after Congress convened.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me read the first three paragraphs of this article:

A projected Senate inquiry into the American military government in Germany and Austria was spiked today.

Chairman HARLEY M. KILGORE, Democrat, of West Virginia, of the War Investigating Committee, prevented the issue from coming to a vote of Members present. But Republicans who have been pressing for the inquiry promised to review the project when Congress convenes in January, with their party in control.

The action coincided with the disclosure of secret testimony before the committee by Lt. Gen. Lucius D. Clay, placing at $200,000,000 a year the cost of the military government of the American zone in Germany, of which he is deputy military governor. He said a Senate investigation now would vastly complicate the democratization programs under way in the American and British zones.

That was the thought I had in mind when I referred to this subject.

In the New York Herald Tribune of December 8, 1946, there is an article by Mr. William L. Shirer which deals extensively with this and other matters and has to do with the Meader report. So far as I know, the statements of Mr. Shirer have never been challenged. Perhaps the Senator did not see the statements.

Mr. BREWSTER. I was out of the country at that time. I think the only charge the Senator may make is that some of us did not change our opinion after the election.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this debate unduly; but what have we now before the Senate? The Senator from Maine wants to have an investigation made into war corruption, undue profits, graft, political influence, and other activities of a similar nature. There can be no question that he is right about that. If there is evidence anywhere that leads to the fact that there has been improper conduct in the execution of war contracts or what not, there is ample justification for a complete investigation. That is what I propose shall take place.

What have we done here? After starting out to investigate the whole wide world, which could have been accomplished under the original resolution offered by the Senator from Maine, he himself has reduced the area of the purported activities in which the committee would indulge; he has reduced it to those which apply only to the United States and certain territories, and which occurred before a certain date in 1946. So all that is now agreed to.

My resolution is identical with his. Therefore, what remains? The only thing that remains is the question of who shall do the job. I respectfully submit that only 2 weeks ago the Members on the other side of the aisle were fighting for places on the important committee called the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. It is perfectly plain to me, from reading the list of the personnel of that committee, that both sides picked out very good men to serve on that committee, because it is obviously one of the ablest committees of this body. To prove my point, let me state that one of the members of the committee is the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], who has established a fine reputation, both in his native State and since he has come to the Senate, as being an outstanding, comprehensive, and skilled investigator. He is on that committee. The Senator from Maine is on other committees, in addition to the special committee. He has a great deal of work to do in connection with his regular committees. I have forgotten what they are, for the moment; but they are two of the most important committees established in the Senate. The Senator from Michigan is also on other committees. The other members of this so-called special committee, if it is established, will be members of other Senate committees. Therefore, Mr. President, why not have the one committee which was created for this very purpose undertake this investigation?

We hear it said, "It will take the other committee 18 years to familiarize themselves with the work." Mr. President, I shudder to think what would happen to this Republic if the able Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] and the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] were to meet with a serious accident which would necessitate their remaining in the hospital for 3 or 4 months. The dome of the Capitol would crack and shake. Justice would disappear from all the law chambers of the Republic and the Senate would stand impotent before the war grafters and criminals and would not be able to do a thing about them because, forsooth, no other committee could step into the gap and carry on this glorious work to a successful conclusion.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield at that point?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think there is illustrated here one of the interesting questions dealing with reorganization, inasmuch as when this resolution was originally submitted the apparent challenge on the basis of the question of encroachment on jurisdiction came from the Committee on Armed Services. Its challenge was that we were investigating Army and Navy affairs and that we were encroaching on its jurisdiction.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct; when the special committee was dealing with military government, it was encroaching on the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. BREWSTER. I was called before the Committee on Armed Services, which claimed that it had primary jurisdiction in the matter, to answer very searching inquiries addressed to me by the able Senator from Maryland, inquiries as to what we proposed to do, and why. I answered them as well as I could. I was charmed, as always, with the attitude of the Senator from Maryland, who did not quite complete his quotation of the conversation in regard to what he asked, as he has referred to it here, for when he asked the Senator from Maine to present an amendment which would somewhat define the scope of the future activities in accordance with our conversation, he stated that if that were done, it might moderate the vigor of his opposition. He did not commit himself.

Mr. TYDINGS. I stated that it would reduce the area of hostility. Those were the exact words I used.

Mr. BREWSTER. And I think the Senator from Maryland will recall that he subsequently said it might moderate the vigor of his opposition.

Mr. TYDINGS. And it has, because if this resolution had remained in its former shape, I think the arguments against it could have been so forcefully marshaled that even the Senator from Maine would have voted against his own resolution.

Mr. BREWSTER. If this be moderation, then I am intrigued by the limitless capacity which the Senator from Maryland thus arrogates to himself.

Mr. TYDINGS. Not by me, but by the Senator's own side.

Mr. BREWSTER. But now, after 2 days of debate, I suddenly find that the question of jurisdiction has been transferred to another committee, and it is now charged that anything dealing with this matter should be handled by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. I am not presuming even to express an opinion in a matter which has been so learnedly discussed. I point out, however, that it presents again the question that, pending the fuller development of our new procedure under the reorganization, a great many of these problems will necessarily arise, and the fact of this transitional period it seems to me further accentuates the wisdom of continuing the committee, concerning whose jurisdiction and activities there certainly would be no doubt.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BREWSTER. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator from Maine be good enough to bring to the attention of the Senate—I do not happen to have it here—the names of the Republican and Democratic Members of the Senate who now are on the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes. The Members on the Republican side of the aisle are the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL], and the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND].

Mr. TYDINGS. And yourself?

Mr. BREWSTER. And myself.

On the Democratic side of the aisle the survivors are the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. They are the six members.

Mr. TYDINGS. In any event, how large will this special committee be, if continued?

Mr. BREWSTER. It will be composed of 10 Senators.

Mr. TYDINGS. How many members will the Democrats have of the 10?

Mr. BREWSTER. All the discussions have contemplated that the corresponding division which prevailed when the Democrats were in the majority would henceforth prevail. In other words, there would be six Republicans and four Democrats. That is subject to the decision of the Presiding Officer who makes the appointments.

Mr. TYDINGS. If that be true, then two new Republican members and two new Democratic members will have to be appointed to the special committee.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. So to begin with practically 50 percent of the committee will be brand new.

Mr. BREWSTER. Let us say 40 percent.

Mr. TYDINGS. If we leave out the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], who will be on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and whose experience will be carried over from the old special committee to the newly created standing committee, the special committee will be on a 50–50 basis. So all this talk about the experience of the old committee really reduces itself to almost nothing, for, in effect, the committee will be half new anyway, and the files and the experts and the men who made the investigations will be just as available to the committee headed by the distinguished Senator from Vermont as they will be to the committee headed by the distinguished Senator from Maine.

Mr. President, there should be no more of this talk that the Democrats want to interfere with this investigation. I have said nothing or done nothing, either in public or in private, that would lead anyone to believe other than that I want this investigation to be made. The whole point is that it should be made by a committee which the Senate but 2 weeks ago constituted for the very purpose under consideration. The reason the opposition of the Committee on Armed Services has been eliminated is, as the Senator from Maine has said, that when he appeared before that committee, he said he would try to draft the resolution in such a way as to stay out of all matters over which that committee had charge, and that so far as he was personally concerned, he himself would do so.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is absolutely inaccurate.

Mr. TYDINGS. I mean matters such as military government, operating the Army and the Navy.

Mr. BREWSTER. Any current matters concerning the Army and the Navy. That was the whole purport of the discussion, but not as to the fact that these matters might be claimed——

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not talking about war contractors. I am talking about Army and Navy matters per se, matters such as military government, and so forth.

The Senator from Maine likewise stated, and he has made his representation good, that he was not going outside the United States and possibly some of the Territories. That allayed the fears of the Democrats on the Committee on Armed Services and the fears of some of the Republican members of that committee.

Now I think he should allay the fears of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Certainly if it was fair to take that part of the investigation away from himself, so that the Committee on Armed Services might deal with matters affecting the Army and the Navy in their general routine operation, by the same token he should leave out of it the State Department.

Mr. BREWSTER. I did not know that the State Department entered into the matter.

Mr. TYDINGS. After the Reorganization Act was passed the Senator was one of four who approved writing to the War Department asking all the questions which I have read at length, some 40 of them.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is not an accurate statement.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator mean to say that that was done without his knowledge?

Mr. BREWSTER. I have already stated here that I had never seen the questionnaire which the Senator read. It has further been stated on this floor that that questionnaire was developed by the counsel of the committee in Germany after he had made 2 weeks' investigation, and that his action over there was the result of instructions he received from the chairman of the committee, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], and former Senator Mead, and that so far as the then minority was concerned, to my knowledge, we had no knowledge of this until the matter was returned here, and that the only divided vote was on the question, in November, whether or not the committee at that time should proceed overseas.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is it not true that the Senator visited the distinguished President pro tempore, now presiding, and considered making certain investigations, and discussed the matter with him in New York?

Mr. BREWSTER. The matter was gone into very thoroughly with both the Secretary of State and with the distinguished President pro tempore, who was an adviser to the Secretary of State.

Mr. TYDINGS. And as the result of that the Senator then moved away from certain phases, perhaps, of the scope of his investigation, because he felt it was beyond the purview of the special committee?

Mr. BREWSTER. Because the committee has always tried to exhibit the utmost deference in problems of that kind, particularly where any possible diplomatic questions were involved.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Is it not a fact that after the Senator from Maine had the conference in New York with the Senator from Michigan and the Secretary of State, when he returned a vote was taken as to whether the committee would go to Europe, and did not all the Republicans vote to go to Europe notwithstanding that conversation?

Mr. BREWSTER. That is quite correct, but it is not correct that the scope of the investigation was not then curtailed in accordance with the advice of counsel and discussion we had with the diplomatic authorities concerned. It was understood that we should not move into a field which might seem to present possible occasions of conflict or embarrassment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, it seems to me that from the country's standpoint, there is very little of real merit in this effort to have a special committee override the normal functions of the Senate. It does not make any difference whether the amendment I have offered, which is identical with the Brewster amendment in all respects but one, shall be agreed to, or whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine shall be adopted, for in either case there will be exactly the same kind of investigation. The experts of the present special committee will be available to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] or to the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], depending upon which committee the Senate entrusts with the work.

The point is that there have just been a Democratic caucus and a Republican caucus, and all the old Members and all the new Members have fought for places on the 15 committees which now take the place of the 33 old committees. They have said to their friends on the steering committee, "Get me on this and get me on that if you can." They have written letters to the chairmen of the conferences showing their preferences. Finally, a week ago, the names were made public, and one of the finest and ablest committees of this body is the committee created to have supervision over the expenditures in the executive departments. That means the expenditures in the War Department, the Navy Department, the Department of the Interior, the Treasury, and all other departments of the Federal Government. No sooner is that committee created than a measure is brought into this body which says in effect that that committee is not able to do the work—"I want to do the work, I want it done as I want it done."

I exculpate all Senators from being politically ambitious, because long experience in the Senate has shown me that that mean thing called political ambition does not pervade the Senate. No one here is politically ambitious. There is not a Senator who would take the Presidency unless it were thrust upon him, and then at terrific sacrifice. He would only do it to serve mankind. I know that my friend the Senator from Maine has not any thought in his mind except the welfare of the Republic. I do not think the matter of a few headlines is worrying him in the slightest. He wants to make this investigation, and if the press makes up its mind to disregard his findings and not to connect his name with this crusade for truth and righteousness, probably in the silence of his chamber he will thank Almighty God that the press was so considerate.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. In view of the observations of the able Senator from Maryland, I was wondering whether he recalls the story that is told in the history of the Senate by Haynes to which Speaker Reed, so-called "Czar" Reed, when he was Speaker of the House, is reported to have given currency. Speaker Reed said he dreamed that the United States by constitutional amendment provided for the election of President by a secret vote of the Senate, and the time came for the first Presidential election by the Senate. The Senate convened and there was a secret ballot under the new plan while those in the galleries looked tensely down on the scene, and the Nation waited with bated breath for the result. When the ballots were all tallied it was found that each Senator had one vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. TDYINGS. Mr. President, there is no question as to whether the investigation shall be made or shall not be made. The question is, Shall the standing committee of the Senate which has been created to make it go ahead and make it, or shall we have many special committees interfering with the work of the standing committees? There is nothing else to it—not a thing in the world. That is all there is at stake.

I repeat, with due deference, and with all the frankness of which I am capable, that in my opinion if the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments is passed over and a special committee created to do this work, it will be a direct reflection on the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, an indication that the Senate feels they are not competent to perform the services for which their respective parties have selected them.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I am in thorough accord with what the Senator from Maryland is saying about the investigation being carried on, and being carried on vigorously. I think every Member of this body, regardless of which side of the aisle he sits on, favors an investigation.

I have been to the desk just now and have read the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Maryland, and have observed that he followed the language, as he said, of the original resolution, which contains a limitation of time, fixing June 30, 1946, as the limit as to which an investigation shall be made; in other words, that the committee shall not investigate into any matter which occurred after June 30, 1946.

I wish to ask the Senator if he would not consider striking out that time limit. Crookedness is crookedness whether it occurred after June 30, 1946, or before. There are vast proceedings now under way in various departments of the Government, involving vast sums of money, surplus properties, and things of that kind, which may require continual investigation. I suggest to the Senator that he give thought to striking out the time limitation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the substitute I have offered shall be adopted, I shall then be in favor of striking out any limitation on time whatsoever, or at least perhaps on more lengthy reflection fixing a different one. The only reason why this limitation is included is that I did not wish to deviate from the measure presented by the Senator from Maine. I have no objection at all to doing what the Senator from New Mexico suggests. But let me put to him a case. Let us suppose we had set up a special committee to investigate war profits the Government's handling of war profits and the handling of war contracts; does the Senator from New Mexico know of any restriction which would thereby be placed on the committee having charge of expenditures in the executive departments from doing the same identical work?

Mr. HATCH. Certainly not, and I should like to suggest to the Senator a point I had in mind in relation to the time limitation. These investigations have been proceeding and they will continue over a long period of time. Regardless of what Senators now say as to the experience of the members of the special committee, and that they are the only ones with adequate experience in the particular field, they have repeatedly said that it is the purpose to terminate the special committee at a date not too far distant in the future. Whenever that time comes, I venture the opinion there will still be work to be done in the way of investigation, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments will have to take over and carry on investigations which must be made. Why not have that committee take over now?

Mr. TYDINGS. The suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico is very much in point. Some of these investigations may go on for 3 or 4 years before they are finally concluded. Take the Teapot Dome case. It dragged on and on before it finally came to a head. Therefore if this special committee should die a year from now and the work should go over to the standing committee, which is made up preponderantly of able members of the majority party in this body, why not start it and let it go through and finish the whole job, and not have a hiatus in the middle of the investigation?

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. That is especially true, when the special committee is being reorganized, new members are being added, and it will start out in effect as a new committee with the exception of the few members remaining.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct, and particularly when one of the ablest Members on that committee will be a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, who will carry his experience to a committee that is ready to go ahead.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I think I ought to make my position clear, that if the substitute amendment of the Senator from Maryland should be adopted, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments would not be restricted in their investigations by any date terminating the life of the War Investigating Committee. We might be restricted by the funds made available, but the reorganization law giving authority to the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments, on page 6, under (2) (B), states:

> Studying the operations of Government activities at all levels with a view to determining its economy and efficiency.

I interpret that to mean any executive agency of the Government.

In section 134 (a) of the same law we read:

> Each standing committee of the Senate, including any subcommittee of any such committee, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony and to make such expenditures (not in excess of $10,000 for each committee, during any Congress)—

That might be a limitation—

> as it deems advisable.

Then we read this:

> Each such committee may make investigations into any matter within its jurisdiction, may report such hearings as may be had by it, and may employ stenographic assistance at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words.

So I interpret the law to mean that any date would not restrict the investigation of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, because, as I see it, we would have the entire field of executive agencies, and we have the authority under section 134 to subpena witnesses, books, and so forth, and to make investigations into any matter, which means any department of the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator is correct about that.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I think there can be no question about the purpose of the act which has just been read, especially the section that bears upon standing committees, and the continuing, not privilege, but obligation to make investigations and to keep in constant contact with the executive departments of government. But under the resolution as offered, when the limitation was inserted in it, it occurred to me it would be better to remove the limitation so there would be no doubt at all. I agree with the Senator that his committee is a continuing committee, with continuing power that should not be taken from it.

Mr. AIKEN. As I interpret it, the power of the committee would not be restricted by the date, but the use of the funds appropriated to it might be restricted.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. As I see it, in my judgment, this limitation in no wise affects the power that is contained in the Reorganization Act affecting this particular committee. In other words, when under the proposed limitation the power of the special committee ended, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments would immediately take over, under the present terms of the Reorganization Act, which gives the committee the unlimited power of which the Senator has spoken.

Mr. AIKEN. But it does not give the committee unlimited funds.

Mr. LUCAS. That is true.

Mr. AIKEN. The committee is limited to $10,000.

Mr. LUCAS. That is true, and the question of funds ultimately becomes, of course, a matter for determination by the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado and Mr. KNOWLAND rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield first to the Senator from Colorado, and then I will yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. My purpose in asking the Senator to yield was to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield for that purpose?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have yielded considerably, Mr. President, but I will yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Maryland, for whom I have the highest regard and respect, his point of view in connection with the amendment which he has proposed as a substitute. I should like to ask him specifically with respect to a number of types of cases which have come before the Committee Investigating the National Defense Program and whether he thinks that under his substitute amendment such cases could properly be gone into by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. I refer particularly to the question of foreign surpluses. Would the Senator feel that that subject would fall under the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments?

Mr. TYDINGS. War surpluses?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. That subject has nothing to do per se with fraud or graft or corruption. As I understand, the purpose primarily of the Committee Investigating the National Defense Program is to uncover improper war profits, graft, corruption, and the like, and the mere existence of war surpluses——

Mr. KNOWLAND. Would the Senator consider that either wastefulness or corruption in the disposal of war surpluses, if any exists, would come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments?

Mr. TYDINGS. They very properly could.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am not going to yield any further, because I have been very generous, and have done very little more than answer questions. From now on I should like to present my case.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Would the Senator from Maryland consider that the question of lend-lease settlements would come under the Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program?

Mr. TYDINGS Unless there were fraud or corruption or wastefulness which was almost criminal, I would consider that that question came under the purview of other committees.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Would the Senator consider the subject of military government abroad to be under the Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; that would be under the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator considers that would be under the Committee on Armed Services. Now let us take the question of the Inter-American Highway as an example. Would the Senator consider that to come properly under the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments?

Mr. TYDINGS. I certainly would.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I now want to call the Senator's attention specifically to this question: During the hearings before the committee, when we had General Clay before us, the question came up——

Mr. TYDINGS. Hearings before what committee?

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. The question came up relative to the flooding of the American zone with Russian occupation marks. In other words, the American, British, French, and Russian Governments all used the same type of occupation marks. The question was asked by me in the committee whether there was any check on the amount of Russian printed money that had come into the American zone to be redeemed, and I should just like at this point——

Mr. TYDINGS. That ought to be considered, in my judgment, by the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. KNOWLAND. By the Committee on Armed Services rather than the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments?

Mr. TYDINGS. Although if an investigation of that particular matter were being held, and I were submitting a resolution dealing with the subject I would be content with the reference made by the Chair.

Mr. KNOWLAND. If it is a question in which the American people are profoundly interested——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from California if he will not allow me to conclude. I have answered six or seven questions, and I secured the floor to tell the Senator what I believe should be done, and I do not want the Senator to tell me what he believes should be done.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think the question I have in mind relates to a matter which should be cleared up because it is definitely something in which the American people have a very vital interest. I shall pursue the matter when the Senator has concluded.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have a very high regard for the Senator from California, and I hope he will not think I am discourteous, but I have been on the floor a long while and I have yielded very liberally to every Senator who asked me to yield. I should like to conclude my remarks and turn the floor over to some other Senator. That is my only reason for appearing to be a little short.

Mr. President, there is only one problem involved. The investigation will be made in any event. It will be made by the Senate. It will be ordered by the Senate. Whether the Brewster resolution or some other resolution is adopted, there will be an investigation. Do we wish to place that investigation in the hands of a committee which will die within a year? When it does die, the regular standing committee must pick up the threads of the work of the special committee and carry on the investigation for a year, 2 years, or 3 years longer. Do we want a hiatus in the investigation? If we are really going after the crooks and criminals, one committee ought to carry the investigation all the way through, even if it requires 4 or 5 years.

The special committee is limited by the resolution of the Senator to a mere year.

What an affront it is to new Members on both sides of the aisle to take this work away from the very committee which was created to undertake it.

First, there is the chairman, the Senator from Vermont, GEORGE D. AIKEN, a former Governor of Vermont and a long-respected Member of the Senate.

The next name on the list is that of HOMER FERGUSON, the junior Senator from Michigan, who was a judge on the bench in Michigan, and in this body is one of the ablest investigators ever to be associated with any investigation in the history of the American Republic. He is No. 2 on the committee.

Name No. 3 on the list is that of BOURKE B. HICKENLOOPER, the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Iowa has been a very active and energetic member of the Special Committee To Investigate Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, 1946. He is eminently qualified to be a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Incidentally, he is a former Governor of Iowa.

Next we come to the name of JOHN W. BRICKER, the junior Senator from Ohio, of whom Republicans thought so much that in the last campaign he was their Vice-Presidential candidate. Now Republican Senators would spurn him and say, "While he is a member of the committee charged with doing a particular job, we will not let him do it. He has not had enough experience. He does not know his way around." Yet only 2 years ago Republicans were beating the bushes and asking the people of all parties to support this outstanding American who has been three times Governor of Ohio and a Vice-Presidential candidate. Now it is said, "BRICKER is not experienced enough to conduct a Senate investigation."

Who else is on the committee? The next name is that of EDWARD J. THYE, the junior Senator from Minnesota, a former Governor of his State. As I understand from a long distance, he is the lieutenant of that eminent progressive Republican candidate for President, Hon. Harold Stassen. If he is good enough to be an ambassador without portfolio in this body and elsewhere for Governor Stassen, if Governor Stassen should become our President the junior Senator from Minnesota would sit close to the throne. He is well qualified to be a member of this committee.

The next name is that of JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY, the junior Senator from Wisconsin, a former judge, a young man with a fine war record. He is a member of the committee and is anxious to go to work and do a difficult job.

The next name on the committee is that of IRVING M. IVES, the junior Senator from New York, who comes from another segment of the Republican family. He made a fine record in the New York State Senate. I can speak only unofficially, but I suspect that sometimes he is the voice of the distinguished Republican who lately asked the suffrage of the people for the highest office in our Republic—the Presidency.

That constitutes the list of majority members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

On one of the early days in this session an event took place which seemed of very small moment, but in a way it was significant. We had had a set of precedents connected with the chaplaincy of the Senate. We never had removed Chaplains, whether the administration was Republican or Democrat. A change was made only in the event of death or a vacancy. However, I think largely in a thoughtless way—I am certain that it was not done deliberately—there was a change of Chaplains, effective on that date. I understand that the result of that change was to put a Republican out, and unwittingly to put a Democrat in. I am advised that that is what happened. At any rate, there were Senators on the other side of the aisle who felt a certain degree of humiliation because thoughtlessly they had got into a situation which they, as well as their colleagues on this side of the aisle, regretted.

There is a large amount of the same human element involved in what we are now doing. The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments is specifically charged with inquiring into all the business transactions in the many departments of the Government, both in war and in peacetime. Senators fought to get on that committee. On this side of the aisle we placed some of the best men we had on that committee, so that it would be well balanced, and so that able Senators on the other side of the aisle would not run off with the market wagon. On the other side of the aisle the top men were selected including a former Vice-Presidential candidate, the representatives of three of the leading Presidential candidates in the last election, as well as the coming election, and that able investigator the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON]. We shall hand over to that committee, lock, stock, and barrel, the existing trained staff to go ahead with this undertaking, and give the committee all the records. What excuse, therefore, is there for saying, "No; we are going to violate the letter of the Reorganization Act. We are going to throw that over. We are going to throw BRICKER over. We are going to throw AIKEN over. We are going to throw HICKENLOOPER over. We are going to throw THYE over. We are going to throw all the Republicans on that committee over." In effect, the proponents of such a course say to the people whom those Senators represent in their respective States, "We Republicans did not think enough of those men to let them discharge the functions of the committee to which they were appointed. We felt that they ought not to have any part in the investigation. Therefore we gave that work to a special committee headed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER]," who we all know has no political ambitions whatsoever.

That is the problem. I know, as well as I know that I am standing on this floor, that the matter of the chaplaincy was a matter of extreme regret to Senators on both sides of the aisle, when the full import of what was taking place came home. Do not minimize this incident. We shall hear more about it. It is a precedent. I have been in the Senate long enough to know that eventually one special committee after another will be organized, as has been done in the past, if once we get away from doing the work through our standing committees. Already, besides this committee and the Small Business Committee, there are resolutions on the desk to create other committees. When we do that, all we have left of the Reorganization Act is a salary grab, an increase from $10,000 to $15,000 a year, under the guise of reorganizing Congress and having experts in order to do a more efficient job. The very first act after we assemble is to cut down all the remainder of it.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Do not forget the retirement fund also, which is more important and valuable than the salary increase.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I appeal to new Members on this committee to protect their own interests. Twenty years or more ago which I came to this body, in a weak moment, I told the Democratic leader to give me any committee assignment that other Senators did not want. I have been paying for that generosity for 20 years. Senators will pay for their actions. Make no mistake about that. This investigation will go ahead no matter which of the two courses we adopt. The abler Senators will be on the standing committees. Practically half of the special committee will consist of new Senators.

The standing committee is staffed with preeminently able men who have had great experience in executive administration. There is nothing involved except a difference in machinery, because the Republicans will control both committees, so it makes no difference whether the Senate adopts my amendment or that of the Senator from Maine. Let us perform the work of the Congress through standing committees and show the country that when we widely advertised this great reform there was in our words a sincerity that is now backed up by action.

Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD an article from the New York Herald Tribune, dated December 8, 1946, by William L. Shirer; also an article appearing in the New York Times under date of November 26, 1946, by Felix Belair, Jr.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of December 8, 1946]

RELEASE OF MEADER REPORT HELD BLOW AT UNITED STATES FOREIGN RELATIONS

(By William L. Shirer)

That the state of affairs in both American military government and the United States army of occupation in Germany is far from perfect is obvious to anyone who has passed even a fortnight or two in the Reich. George Meader, counsel for the Senate War Investigating Committee, visited Germany for only a few weeks last fall, but his confidential yet much publicized report on the subject has raised a hullabaloo in Washington.

Whether the situation can be improved by conducting a senatorial investigation in Germany, as the four Republican members of the committee propose, is highly doubtful. What is not doubtful at all is that such an investigation could greatly damage both our occupation job in Germany and the very prestige of the Republic in foreign affairs, as Senator VANDENBERG has tried to explain to his Republican colleagues on the committee.

It surely is obvious to the more thoughtful Republican Members of the Senate such as Mr. VANDENBERG that whatever political footballs are uncovered and booted about when the party takes control of the Congress in January, our occupation of Germany should not be one of them. Too much that is vital to America's position in the world is involved.

This does not mean that whatever is wrong with our occupation of Germany should not be exposed and corrected. But action, it seems to me, should come from the President, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. It is hardly the responsibility or even the concern of a special Senate committee which has no mandate whatsoever to meddle in the Nation's foreign affairs.

This, I have reason to believe, was made clear to Mr. Meader, in the midst of his brief and breathless investigation, by Senator VANDENBERG himself at a meeting in Paris on October 12. When the committee's counsel explained to the Senator what he was up to in Germany, Mr. VANDENBERG strenuously objected, pointing out that Mr. Meader and his committee were invading the field of foreign relations in which they had no business.

The advice was repeated, I am informed, at a private meeting at the Waldorf in New York on November 13. Three Republican members of the Senate committee, BREWSTER, FERGUSON, and KNOWLAND, accompanied by counsel Meader, met on that day with Secretary Byrnes and Senators VANDENBERG and CONNALLY. The three men who have been carrying the load in the delicate negotiations of their country with the other powers protested vigorously at the proposal of the Special Committee To Investigate the American Occupation of Germany. They explained that this would necessarily be an investigation into our foreign policy, that it would seriously interfere with current negotiations of the American Government in the United Nations and in the Council of Foreign Ministers, and that it would greatly weaken our position in dealing with other nations.

QUESTION GENERAL CLAY

The Republican Senators do not seem to have been unduly impressed by this advice. On November 18, one learns, they asked Gen. Lucius D. Clay, deputy military governor in Germany, whether the proposed investigation would have a damaging effect on our Government in dealing with other governments. The general replied that he did not want to advise the committee on such a matter, but after detailed questioning he made it more than clear that, in his opinion, an investigation would be extremely damaging. In answer to questions, he gave a number of details on confidential matters to show what damage could be done to the Nation's position and to its ability to negotiate with other nations.

It is a curious comment on the mores of our times that Counsel Meader's confidential report on his 3 weeks in Germany was made public last week. For, as the Republican members of the special committee, Senators BREWSTER, BALL, FERGUSON, and KNOWLAND, who directed Mr. Meader to release his report to the press on their authority, emphasize:

"It is not a committee report and has not received the approval of the committee or any member thereof. It was drafted as a confidential report and contains information which was intended for the members of the committee only and not for publication."

Moreover, on November 29, the Secretary of War informed the chairman of the committee that the War Department opposed the release of this report. "It is the view of this department," he wrote, "that this report gives a distorted and frequently erroneous picture of military government in Germany. From information available it appears that the subject matter of the report is based on unsworn statements, and in many cases, on hearsay evidence."

If neither the committee nor indeed even a single member approved the report, which was confidential in the first place, and if the Secretary of War, a highly-respected official, thought it to be "distorted and frequently erroneous," why then did the four Republican Senators direct it to be made public?

Their excuse is that excerpts of an earlier draft of the report and portions of testimony given in committee hearings "giving distorted and inaccurate impressions" had already appeared in the press and that therefore "the only way to correct such inaccuracies is to release the full text." They admit that the full committee declined to authorize its release.

TWO OTHER ASPECTS

Surely there must be few, if any, precedents for such a strange procedure and an ordinary citizen must wonder whether matters of a confidential nature, which all mature governments have to undertake, can ever be properly handled by our own.

There are two other minor aspects of the whole business which, so far as I know, have not been cleared up by the minority members of the committee. The first concerns a decision of the committee taken on November 18 that Senators KILGORE and BREWSTER should confer on November 25 with the Secretary of War on the advisability of a Senate investigation of our German occupation. Senator BREWSTER was in Florida on November 25 but Senator KILGORE, it seems, requested each of the other three Republican Senators to go with him to keep the appointment with Secretary Patterson. They declined to go.

As to the charge that portions of testimony before the committee had leaked to the press, "giving distorted and inaccurate impressions," it has been maintained by those in a position to know that the leaks were by no means one-sided. The first confidential matter in connection with the proposed inquiry into the American occupation of Germany appears to have come up at a hearing on August 14. On that date the committee heard charges made by Col. Francis P. Miller, formerly an AMG officer. They were serious charges and later the Inspector General of the War Department, after a special inquiry, cast doubt as to the accuracy of many of them.

Colonel Miller's testimony was taken in executive session of the committee and was never released to the public.

What some members of the committee are now asking is whether an article published in the November 9 issue of Liberty magazine by a member of the committee, Senator BREWSTER, did not in fact contain a paraphrase of the colonel's confidential testimony?

If so, they ask, who did some of the leaking, anyway?

OCCUPATION STUDY BALKED BY KILGORE—SENATOR BLOCKS VOTE ON INQUIRY INTO MILITARY GOVERNMENT OF GERMANY, AUSTRIA

(By Felix Belair, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, November 15.—A projected Senate inquiry into the American military government in Germany and Austria was spiked today.

Chairman HARLEY M. KILGORE, Democrat, of West Virginia, of the War Investigating Committee prevented the issue from coming to a vote of members present. But Republicans who have been pressing for the inquiry, promised to revive the project when Congress convenes in January, with their party in control.

The action coincided with the disclosure of secret testimony before the committee by Lt. Gen. Lucius D. Clay, placing at $200,000,000 a year the cost of the military government of the American zone in Germany, of which he is deputy military governor. He said a Senate investigation now would vastly complicate the democratization programs under way in the American and British zones.

WARNING CITED

Testifying before an executive session of the committee last week, General Clay said that the future cost of his military government would depend on conditions prevailing there and the extent of economic unification achieved with the British zone. But he warned that it would be considerably more expensive even under unification before it became any cheaper.

General Clay's testimony included a statement that he was encountering "serious difficulties" this year in collecting assigned quotas of agricultural production from German farmers in the American zone and that "we may have to resort to strong-arm methods" to bring about desired results.

An unscheduled meeting of the committee developed when Senator OWEN BREWSTER, Republican, of Maine, missed an appointment with Chairman KILGORE to confer at the War Department on the projected investigation with Secretary Robert P. Patterson. Learning that Mr. BREWSTER had left for Florida, Chairman KILGORE sought out Senators JOSEPH H. BALL, Republican, of Minnesota; HOMER FERGUSON, Republican, of Michigan; and WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, Republican, of California. With them Chairman KILGORE proposed to keep the date with Secretary Patterson, but they refused and demanded a vote on the investigations in Germany and Austria.

VOTE INVALIDATED

Senator Hugh B. Mitchell, Democrat, of Washington, had appeared meanwhile but Chairman KILGORE ruled out the vote on the ground that a quorum was not present.

Chairman KILGORE made the further point that there had been no notice of the present meeting to members. He ruled that no further action on the matter could be taken until there had been a poll of absent members. At the same time he recalled that Senator Tom Connally, of Texas, James Mead, of New York, James M. Tunnell, of Delaware; and Frank P. Briggs, of Missouri; all Democrats, had opposed the investigation. Chairman KILGORE added that he was very loath to see any action taken on the project in view of the stated objections of Senator ARTHUR VANDENBERG, Republican, of Michigan, who is slated to be chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee in the new Congress.

Although the State and War Departments had gone all out in their opposition to the projected investigation, General Clay's testimony clinched the outcome, according to some of those who heard him.

CLAY POINTS TO DIFFICULTIES

Although he described the differences between the American and British authorities as "very apparent," General Clay said he thought the prospect for eventual economic unification very good. The chief difficulty at present was that the British thought they were contributing a great deal more than the Americans.

This was true, in a sense, General Clay said, although he pointed out that it was a relatively greater contribution of German resources rather than British. But he said the British did have the "valid" point that they had to provide German coal miners and steel workers with a daily diet of 4,000 calories and that, if we expected to benefit from their output, we should be willing to share the expense of feeding them.

At the time of his departure from Germany, General Clay said, about $8,000,000 of products had been exported from the American zone and $3,000,000 more was covered by contracts scheduled for delivery "in the forthcoming months."

EXPLAINS FOOD PROBLEM

The difficulty with the collection of assigned quotas of foodstuffs, according to General Clay, was that they were paid for with occupation marks, which were good only for such things as food and rent. "Those things are not attractive to the farmer who wants shoes and clothing," he said.

General Clay explained that at the latest meeting of the state governments he had asked the administrators "to enforce the measures they had at the present time and to go out and get the food in or we might have to resort to large inspection forces and go out and find it ourselves and take it away."

Asked about the relative merits of civilian as against military administration of the American zone, General Clay explained that, while he preferred to make no comment on the question of taxing involved, there was no question that "essentially and basically the final job will have to be civilian. We can't democratize any country with men in uniform," he remarked.

General Clay said that the projected investigation would be deliberately twisted by the Russian-controlled press in Germany "to criticize and discredit not only American but British military government."

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, a few weeks ago there was much speculation as to whether or not the new Congress would observe the reforms instituted in the Congressional Reorganization Act or whether it would choose, in the exercise of its rule-making power, to ignore that statute and continue the multiplicity of committees which formerly existed. After we convened the country heaved a sigh of relief upon learning that both parties planned to follow through on the streamlining of Congress.

Yet today, less than 2 weeks from the opening day, a move is on foot to subvert the La Follette-Monroney Act, not through direct action, but through circumvention. We do not dare to face the public and tell them that we are ignoring the act which was passed last year amid a fanfare of so much favorable publicity. Instead we tell them that we are following the act, but we proceed to find ways to avoid its effect.

The attempt to create special committees today is an attack at the very heart of the La Follette-Monroney law. It is an attempt to exploit one of its loopholes and to drive a train through it—a "gravy train," I might add.

Under the Reorganization Act the jurisdiction of the standing committees was carefully described. The rules covered every conceivable subject of legislation. To create a special committee we must therefore trespass upon the assigned jurisdiction of some standing committee. For example, legislation to benefit small business is now before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Judiciary Committee has a very excellent bill which was drafted by the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and of which I have the honor of being a cosponsor. I have taken especial interest in title V of that bill, which has to do with loans to small business, and have introduced it as a separate bill, which has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The chairman of that committee has already announced hearings on that bill and other legislation which will be of particular assistance to small business units, but which is nevertheless inextricably tied together with broader subjects.

And so with other subjects of legislation dealing with small business. Each of them falls into the jurisdiction of an existing standing committee. To take this subject matter away from standing committees would be to imply that the members of such committees are derelict in their attitudes toward small business.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. Am I not correct in understanding that at a meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee the other day it was the unanimous decision of both Republicans and Democrats that a Small Business Subcommittee should be appointed to which such matters should be referred, and that it was only a question of when it should be done?

Mr. TAYLOR. The Senator's statement is correct. At the meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee it was not even deemed necessary to authorize the chairman to appoint a small-business subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. MAYBANK. Will the Senator further yield on that point?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. It was conceded by every member of the committee that the law required it and granted the proper authority to do it.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is correct. Let me add that the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee has made it known that he intends to constitute a small-business subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee.

With the greatest respect to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] I do not think we can say that his solicitude for small business is any greater than that of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY].

The creation of a rash of special committees along commodity lines—for silver, wool, petroleum, and so forth—will break down the regular standing committee structure whose realinement was the heart of congressional reorganization. It will also add correspondingly to the work load of the Senators appointed to serve on special committees.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am very happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator has mentioned committees dealing with silver, wool, petroleum, and other commodities, on some of which I have served. Some of them have done great and valuable service. There is yet work to be done by those committees. If a committee is set up now for one purpose, will the Senate deny the right to have other special committees likewise continued?

Mr. TAYLOR. Let me say to the Senator from New Mexico that pressure will be put upon us to do everything possible in connection with the various commodities, and if a special committee is set up for one purpose we shall be asked to establish special committees to protect our interests in the West, and it will indeed be difficult for us to hold back the tide if a hole is opened in the dike.

Mr. HATCH. Is it not true that other resolutions have been introduced—I know of at least one—providing for special committees?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes; that is true.

Mr. President, the standing committees of the Senate have been authorized by the Legislative Reorganization Act to exercise continuous oversight of the execution of the laws by the administrative agencies within their respective jurisdictions. They are being equipped with professional and expert staffs to assist them in dealing with the agencies on a day-to-day basis, and for this purpose they have been armed with the subpena power. The diffusion of energy and responsibility among many standing and special committees, with overlapping jurisdictions, is not conducive to the formulation of coherent and consistent legislative policies. Neither is it conducive to developing a well-recognized and continuing relationship with executive agencies. The philosophy of the Reorganization Act requires that the investigatory function of Congress should be performed by its standing committees which have been empowered and equipped for the purpose, instead of relying upon special investigating committees, which cannot introduce legislation to give effect to their recommendations.

Mr. President, an example of that would be as follows: Suppose a special committee on small business were set up. It would delve into various small-business problems, hear testimony, and then make recommendations with respect to needed legislation to one or more of the standing committees. Then the standing committee would have to hear the whole problem over again. There would be a duplication of effort, a waste of time of the Senators involved, and a waste of the taxpayers' money.

It is reported that the Senate Committee on Armed Services has consented to share its jurisdiction over national defense with the proposed Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. No standing committee has the right, under the rules, to delegate part of its assigned authority to a special committee.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DWORSHAK in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator from Idaho has said, as I understood him, that the Committee on Armed Forces offered to share its responsibility.

Mr. TAYLOR. At least it has made a deal. That is my understanding.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Armed Forces, and I wish to state, not only on my behalf but for the other minority members of the committee, that I have never made any such deal, and I do not think any other of the minority members have done so.

Mr. TAYLOR. The understanding which we have gathered from Senators on the other side of the aisle has been that representatives of the two committees have talked over the matter and have arrived at an amicable solution.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I wish to say for myself that I do not think either I or any of the other minority members of the Committee on Armed Forces have arrived at such a solution or have done anything which would warrant such an impression.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I gained such an impression. From the discussion which I have heard so far I have gathered the impression that there was no conflict of interest and that they were divorcing themselves from that phase of the subject. That may be the impression of the majority members, if not that of the minority members.

Mr. MAYBANK. I agree with the Senator from Idaho that that is not the impression of the minority members.

Mr. TAYLOR. Certainly I am glad to know that.

Mr. President, on Wednesday the junior Senator from Maine insisted that a standing committee could not investigate war frauds, because it would be unable to review all the complaints and read all the testimony the special committee has collected. But that is a strange reason for prolonging the existence of a special committee. Certainly, the standing committee would be in no better position to review past testimony, after several more months of hearings, than it is now. At that time the task would be all the more difficult.

Parenthetically, I might point out that most Members of the Senate are already familiar, through the press, with the hearings of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. Indeed, not only are we familiar with its hearings and reports, but we are familiar with its interoffice memos, first drafts, and rejected manuscripts.

Last fall, just before elections, the Senator from Maine dug out of the files of that committee some uncompleted notes on the housing situation, and gave them to the press. He described them as a suppressed report. In fact, they were not a report at all, and the material was found to be erroneous and deceptive; but it happened to be released at a moment when rebuttal could not be made until after the election.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Does the Senator from Idaho happen to know through what agency that release was made public?

Mr. TAYLOR. No; I do not know its history. If the Senator from New Mexico knows about it, I should be very happy to have him explain.

Mr. HATCH. The article which appeared in the New York Times stated that it was released through the Republican National Committee. Strange as it may seem, Mr. President, the Republican National Committee, when releasing a so-called report from a committee of the Senate of the United States, chose to make that release on the 27th day of October, just as the Senator from Idaho has recalled—a very short time before a national election.

Mr. TAYLOR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. But I am quite sure that politics had no bearing upon that matter in any way whatsoever.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was just arriving at the same conclusion in my own mind, as the Senator spoke.

Similarly, Mr. President, we were also treated to the dairy notes made by committee counsel during a brief junket to Germany. These, too, were released without authority and were unveiled by the press, a large majority of which, at least, is always cooperative with Republicans, as another suppressed document. This document was eventually disavowed by everyone, including its own author. It slurred our occupation troops and smeared the honor of the American soldier.

With respect to the Special Committee o Small Business, I am informed that the staff of that committee has already been liquidated, and that the chairman plans to file its final report next Monday.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. In connection with the Senator's mention of the Small Business Committee, let me inquire whether the Senator from Idaho is also informed that the able chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has already appointed a subcommittee of that regular committee to deal with the problems of small business.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was not aware that he had appointed such a subcommittee. I knew it was his intention to do so. But the Senator from New Hampshire is so eminently fair, and always has striven to avoid any appearance of trying to steal a march on anyone, that I understood it was his intention to wait until the matter of the appointment of a special Small Business Committee had been settled on the floor of the Senate. Certainly that would be fairer than what I would do if I were the chairman of a committee and clearly had authority and jurisdiction over a certain subject. I would appoint my subcommittee and would present them with an accomplished fact. The chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee may have done so. I hope he has.

Mr. President, one of the great virtues of the La Follette-Monroney Act is the fact that it would make it possible for all Senators to budget their time. Each of us now serves on two committees. We no longer have three and four conflicting committee meetings on the same morning. We are no longer compelled to scatter our attention helter skelter over the Senate Office Building and the Capitol. Important legislation will no longer come up before committees whose members are absent on other business. If we break down this system, if Senators are appointed to serve on special committees, in addition to their standing committee assignments, the burden of committee work will be multiplied, and the old evils of poor attendance and scattered attention will return.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am happy to yield to the able Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. I should like to ask the Senator, who has been in the Senate a number of years, whether he has found that when a special committee, with a large staff, is holding hearings, other Senators, even though not members of such special committee, frequently receive telegrams from their constituents, and are met by delegations from their home States, asking them to attend the meetings of the special committee, although they have their own committee meetings to attend? That has been my experience.

Mr. TAYLOR. I may say to the Senator from South Carolina that, during the last session of Congress, the Special Committee on Small Business very often had great difficulty in obtaining a quorum at its meetings in order to enable the committee to do its work. At times I have served as acting chairman of the committee and have been the only member of the committee in attendance at its hearings; after we located a sufficient number of Senators who were members of the committee to proceed with its business, the other members of the committee would drift away and would leave me to conduct the proceedings entirely alone, simply because there were so many committee meetings that they could not attempt to attend all of them.

Mr. President, let us look at the subject realistically. A special committee, having no legislative responsibility, and having a broad and continuous mandate, often amounts to nothing more than a large personal staff for its chairman. It inevitably becomes a platform for the personality and the ideas of the men who are running it.

Mr. President, I submit that this is an extremely wasteful procedure. Some of our members who are dissatisfied with the allowance supplied for their office staffs have dug into their own pockets to hire additional help. Those who can afford this are welcome to do so, but it seems highly extravagant for the Senate to confer these extra conveniences upon any of its Members, particularly now that individual Senators have been authorized to employ administrative assistants, and that the standing committees have been authorized to hire clerical and professional staffs.

Where is the vaunted economy to which Republican spokesmen have so frequently referred? Where is the concern for the taxpayer that is said to lie so close to the heart of the majority? Is economy to be practiced only by the executive branch? Are we going to discharge employees and cut salaries in downtown departments only to indulge in a Bacchanalian orgy of self-indulgence on the Hill?

And where, too, is this great concern for the efficiency of the executive departments? Can we expect efficient management if Cabinet officers are constantly called to appear before a multiplicity of committees to repeat their testimony on the same subjects before groups with conflicting and overlapping jurisdiction? And where, too, is that stalwart opposition to Government propaganda? Is it to be forsaken for the syncopated whir of mimeograph machines and the three-ring circus of special committee hearings?

One of the great ends of the Reorganization Act was the cultivation of expertise by the Members of the Senate. We were each to gain in competence through constant familiarity in certain fields of legislation, but this will be defeated if large and important questions are to be carved out of the committee's jurisdiction and handed over to special committees. Sporadic inquiries by special committes will lack continuity and fail to provide the members of standing committees with direct knowledge of the information gathered. In cases where legislative action is indicated the standing committee then finds it necessary to do much of the work over again.

Let us not forget that on June 10, 1946, the Senate approved of the ban on special committees by a vote of 49 to 16. This clause was removed in the House, but not by the membership in open discussion. It was cut out of the bill by the Speaker as part of the price of the bill's admission to the House floor.

Members of the House never had an opportunity to vote upon that provision, and it cannot be said that they rejected it.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. When the Senator says that the banning of special committees was included by a vote of 49 to 16, what he had in mind, I take it, was that the bill containing that particular provision passed the Senate by that vote. The provision itself was not put into the bill by a vote of 49 to 16. In other words, it was the entire bill that passed the Senate and went to the House by the vote the Senator mentions.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is correct, but it would seem that that would be an endorsement of the provision. However, we will not argue the point.

One very significant item emerged from the very able presentation made by the Senator from Michigan yesterday. In support of his claim of popular support for these committees he read a newspaper article by David Lawrence. As he read on, he came across this interesting paragraph—and as he read it blushes came to the faces of his colleagues, but it was too late to stop. I quote:

> The Republicans will prove themselves poor politicians and will virtually hand over the 1948 election to the Democrats if they go along with the let-bygones-be-bygones spirit which is behind the effort to kill off investigating committees.

This appears to be the crux of the matter. The 1948 election is to be won on the playing fields of the hearing rooms. Special committees are to run interference for the 1948 Republican nominee. The 1948 campaign headquarters of the Republican National Committee are going to be opened, at public expense, in the basement of this building.

Gentlemen, never before has such a crass and unconscionable raid been made on the United States Treasury. Surely it is not necessary to ask the Government to pay for the advance barrage of propaganda that will help the new Hoover around the corner to the White House.

Let us not forget, too, that the Reorganization Act has set a special standard for standing committees. It has provided that every committee should have an adequate staff of trained experts, and that some of these experts should be employed by the minority. These provisions were intended to elevate the level of committee work and to facilitate our deliberations. They were intended to provide us with the sort of staff work which is essential for good legislation. The provision of minority staffs is particularly important in this respect because it insures constructive work on the minority side rather than mere sniping and obstruction. Indeed, it is significant that last year the Senate majority strongly supported a grant of funds to make the group which was then the minority more constructive in its approach. The creation of special committees makes it possible to ignore this safeguard. It makes it possible to create committees which do not have staff assistance for the minority members. It is a convenient device for giving large staffs of assistants to the majority without any assistance whatever to the minority.

This, Mr. President, is a direct contradiction not only of the spirit but the letter of the Reorganization Act. The committee was intended by that act to be a deliberative body of the highest order. The special, or loophole committee, will be a loudspeaking system for its chairman.

The action taken today is up to the majority, but the majority should be warned that it will be judged by that action.

Mr. President, the action threatened today has not escaped the attention of those who supported the Reorganization Act. The Washington Post, a newspaper which probably did more than any other to bring this issue to the attention of the Congress and the people, ran two editorials on the subject over the week end. It also ran two brilliant cartoons by Herblock which I regret cannot be inserted into the RECORD. However, they can be described.

I have in my hand a cartoon by Herblock which appeared in yesterday's Washington Post. The picture is a streamlined automobile, which presumably represents the streamlined reorganized Congress. Uncle Sam is in the automobile waiting to go places. But there are two fancy horses hitched to the streamlined automobile, and they are labeled "Extra Committees." There is a gentleman sitting on the horses carrying a banner inscribed "Look—I'm a Committee Chairman." It is a very amusing cartoon.

There was another by Herblock in the Washington Post on Monday, January 13. It is a picture of a gentleman who evidently is newly married. His wife is standing inside the house waiting for the husband to come in, and he is in the act of carrying a second lady across the threshold. There is still another lady standing outside, and probably there are more beyond view, whom we cannot see. The lawful wife is labeled "Reorganization," and the extra lady the new groom is carrying in is labeled "Extra Committees."

Some editorials on the same subject have likewise appeared. The Senator from Michigan quoted from editorials, and he would have had us believe that the public was greatly disturbed and wanted to continue the special investigating committee. I think it only proper that we should present evidence from the press on the other side.

I have here an editorial from the Washington Post of Monday, January 13, entitled "The Senator Is Right." It is about the remarks made on this floor by the very able Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. It reads:

> We think the public will agree with Senator TYDINGS that the attempt to add incongruous patches to the streamlined congressional structure before it gets fully into operation makes a very sorry spectacle.

The remainder of the editorial continues in the same vein. I shall not burden Members of the Senate by reading it, but I ask that the entire editorial be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed, as follows:

THE SENATOR IS RIGHT

We think the public will agree with Senator TYDINGS that the attempt to add incongruous patches to the streamlined congressional structure before it gets fully into operation makes a very sorry spectacle. There can be no disagreement over what the reformers intended. "We recommend," said their report, "that the practice of creating special committees of investigation be abandoned." The new broad-gaged committees were given such extensive jurisdiction that special committees are an excrescence. Since he was an advocate of the reorganization plan, Senator BREWSTER now makes himself a laughing stock by asking the Senate to prolong the life of the War Investigating Committee so as to give him the privileges that would go along with its chairmanship.

Today this issue will be taken up by the new Committee on Armed Services, which should hereafter control all investigations in the military sphere, and perhaps by the Senate itself. We hope both will ponder Senator TYDINGS' words:

"From the public viewpoint, the principal part of the reorganization bill was the salary increase to $15,000. In my humble judgment most of us would have been red in the face had we voted for a salary increase without a reorganization of the Congress. * * * So we reorganized, and every Member of this body knows that one of the reasons why many Senators voted for the bill, in order to justify the over-all act, was that of efficiency, and the disposition and division of duties of the various committees, aside from the salary increase.

"Now we have no sooner met than we say nothing about the $5,000 salary increase, but we proceed to go off in all directions at the same time, with numerous special committees, which in my judgment is a direct reflection upon the membership of the standing committees whose reasonable right and duty it is to make certain investigations."

Mr. TAYLOR. Here is another editorial, from the Washington Post of Saturday, January 11. The title of this editorial is "Slipping." It says:

Republicans in the Senate have begun hacking at the streamlined machinery of Congress almost before it has gotten into operation.

The remainder of the editorial goes on to point out what a mistake this is, that the present committees are authorized to do the work. I ask that the entire editorial be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed, as follows:

SLIPPING

Republicans in the Senate have begun hacking at the streamlined machinery of Congress almost before it has gotten into operation. A cardinal principle of the new organization set up by the La Follette-Monroney Act is the division of all the work of the Senate among 15 standing committees. The act carefully outlines the duties of these 15 units and leaves no room for the functioning of any others. Yet the majority members of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration have voted to create a new Small Business Committee and to extend the life of the War Investigating Committee.

We can see no valid argument for either of their special appendages. Under the old system there was probably good reason for setting up a special Senate committee to investigate wartime activities. It was argued that a special committee was needed to do a wartime job of extraordinary importance. Now, however, that particular job has been finished. Whatever further investigating is to be done ought to be related to improvement of future organization or to correction of mistakes in the reconversion program. The House Committee on Naval Affairs recently gave special emphasis to investigations of the constructive type. "Mistakes [in the reconversion from war to peace] have been made, and undoubtedly mistakes will be made," it wrote. "But the investigatory theme must continue to be preventive rather than punitive, forward rather than backward."

Our point is that this kind of investigative work can be undertaken much more readily by the new Committee on Armed Services, so far as military experience and organization is concerned, and by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, so far as reconversion activities are concerned. Indeed, the latter unit is expressly commissioned to study "the operation of Government activities at all levels with a view to determining its economy and efficiency."

Similarly, small-business legislation falls clearly into the field of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. If the Senate is to have a committee on little business, why should it not also have one on big business, on domestic business, foreign business, and several other varieties? Obviously this trend is running straight back to the splintering process which caused so much confusion, overlapping, and waste effort in the last Congress.

Apparently the Democrats are preparing to resist this whittling away of the reforms so recently put into effect. We hope that a large majority of the Republicans will do likewise. This is not a partisan issue. Rather it is a question of sound and effective organization of the Senate. We should think the Republicans would be taking the lead in strengthening Congress for its formidable tasks instead of slipping backward again.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, on Wednesday the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] made the following statement:

The only point is that it would not be possible to transfer the senatorial committee along with them.

I assume that is the staff about which he was speaking.

Although I do not wish to be immodest or to violate a Presidential confidence, nevertheless let me state that when I reported to the President that I had been named to fill, insofar as possible, the shoes which he had occupied, he suggested that we had had a considerable training in that field and should know something of the problems which we would face.

The emphasis on the word "should" is mine, Mr. President.

So if it is not immodest, I would suggest that that suggestion be taken into account, along with our suggestion.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Maine took unfair advantage of the President by trying to make a courteous personal compliment appear as an endorsement by the President of special committees.

If this practice of taking literally every compliment of our colleagues and capitalizing upon it becomes widespread, the Members of this body may become so cautious and cagey that we might well lose our hard-earned reputation as the most courteous legislative body in the world.

The newspapers headlined this incident as though President Truman had endorsed the continuance of these special committees. Yesterday I saw the President, and I asked him if this were his sentiment. He said that he had intended no such expression, and that several years ago, when passing on the reins to Senator Mead, he had expressed the opinion that the committee was strictly a wartime body whose functions should be wound up promptly after VJ-day.

While everybody acclaims the Congressional Reorganization Act, few seem to have taken the trouble to read it. Here we have the spectacle of a group of Senate leaders proposing a committee to investigate wartime expenditures of funds, on the ground that no standing committee is equipped to do it. That statement may have been true in the Seventy-ninth Congress. It is not true today, because among our new standing committees is the bright and shiny new committee called Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. It is a new committee, with a broad grant of jurisdiction.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. In the interest of accuracy I desire to call the Senate's attention to the fact that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments is an old committee. It has been in existence for several years. Unfortunately, it may be considered as a new committee, because it has been completely inactive in the last 2 or 3 years, but I happened to have been a member of that committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. We, on our side of the aisle, of course, are in the minority, and our judgment would not prevail, but we consider every committee as being a new committee, and each member was placed on committees according to his seniority in the Senate, with no regard to seniority on committees.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has been described as the general investigating committee of the Senate. Indeed, this committee will still be inactive if, without a struggle, it permits its functions to be stripped from it. I, personally, do not propose to permit that to occur.

The first item on its list of powers is the power to investigate misuse of funds and departmental waste and inefficiency. Certainly, Mr. President, no language could be plainer than that delineating the authority of this committee.

It is set up, as are all other standing committees, with a Republican majority. It will have a full staff and a subpena power. Its chairman, the able senior Senator from Vermont whose rock-ribbed integrity and rigid puritanism in matters of public morality have earned him the respect of the righteous and the fear of the wicked, can be trusted to lead his committee vigorously and courageously. He has never been suspected of tolerance toward the reckless bureaucrat. Indeed, he has already announced his intention to probe a subject which the Special Defense Committee has considered too hot to handle—the corruption and graft of the Maritime Commission. As a minority member of that committee I will press for investigation of another subject which the War Investigating Committee has disdained: the excessive freight rates paid to the railroads by the "railroadmen in uniform" who negotiated freight rates for the Army and Navy.

The Expenditures Committee could investigate these matters, not in the sporadic, catch-as-catch-can manner of special committees, but in a serious constructive manner, with an eye toward over-all improvement in the handling of Federal funds.

With all respect to the Truman-Mead committee and its eminent chairman and members, I would like to raise one serious question concerning its functions: Is it not true that most of its investigations could have been handled equally well by a prosecutor, by a special unit of the Justice Department, or by a special grand jury? Is it not true that it did a job that should have been done by the executive branch?

I ask this with all deference. I respect the committee for having done a job that others failed to do. But I think that the legislative job must be a broad, policy-making job. Rather than capture individual wrongdoers, we must make it impossible for all wrongdoers to function. When we investigate we must do so with an eye on future legislation.

All this is elemental. The War Investigating Committee of course realized it. But my point is this: It is much easier for a special committee to forget this than it is for a standing committee. A standing committee always gets back to its calendar of bills, and it remembers its responsibility to report back in terms of proposed corrective measures.

This is not a political question. The majority will control standing committees as well as special committees. It is a question of far greater importance. It is the test of the Congressional Reorganization Act. Either we observe its letter and its spirit or we publicly show our contempt for it by beginning a process of whittling it away, bit by bit.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I should like to introduce one more editorial into the RECORD as part of my remarks. This one is from the News. That makes another Washington newspaper which is opposed to these special committees. The title of this editorial which was in the News last evening is The Reorganized Congress. It begins in this way:

Senator BREWSTER, of Maine, is spreading himself rather thin. He is a member of the Senate Finance Committee, which will have a lot to do on budget and tax matters.

He is a member of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, which handles legislation affecting land, sea, and air transport and communications. And he has been suggested for chairman of its subcommittee to investigate what's causing all the plane crack-ups.

And, if Senate Republican leaders have their way, which seems likely, Senator BREWSTER will be chairman of the special Senate War Investigating Committee, which is to continue its work of uncovering frauds in war contracts.

The editorial continues in the same vein.

I ask that the remainder of the editorial may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remainder of the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is argued that this special committee is justified because members of the Armed Services Committee, which might logically assume jurisdiction, are too closely and uncritically tied to the Army and Navy for a really tough investigation.

There may be enough merit in that argument to warrant making one exception to the general principle of the La Follette-Monroney Act that standing committees should not be weakened by assigning their chores to special committees.

But what of the other special committee Senate Republican leaders are sponsoring? It's to be a new Small Business Committee. So far as we can see, its primary purpose is to give Senator WHERRY, of Nebraska, a chairmanship.

They had a Small Business Committee in the last Congress. It was just a boondoggle. Almost any legislation handled by the Labor Committee, the Banking and Currency Committee or the Finance Committee would affect small business. There's no more reason—beyond the political reason—for a Small Business Committee than for a Big Business Committee.

If the Senate goes on with this policy of creating special committees, what's to prevent a special committee for oil, another for wool, another for silver, ad infinitum. And soon we'll be back where we started before the La Follette-Monroney Act cut down the number of committees to make the legislative branch more efficient and make Congressmen earn their higher pay.

Mr. TAYLOR. Frankly, Mr. President, if political considerations were all that mattered to me, I should be most happy to have the Republicans set up special committees, because certainly I think it would react to their political disadvantage. But I have a greater interest, which is the interest in the efficiency of the operation of the Congress and the welfare of our Nation and its people.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President and Members of the Senate, I wish to make a few remarks on the subject of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. I happen to be one of the junior members of that committee, not having had the long years of service of some of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle. I know, however, that under the able chairmanship of the now President of the United States and under his successors on the other side of the aisle, with the cooperation of Members on this side of the aisle, the committee has done, as I believe it will continue to do in the future, a constructive job that needs to be done for the American people.

We have already had a chance to discuss from time to time whether there is any violation of the so-called La Follette-Monroney Act. I do not believe there is any violation whatever of the spirit of that act, if there be such a spirit. I supported the reorganization legislation, and I believe it was one of the most constructive measures passed during the Seventy-ninth Congress.

I wish to point out to the Members of the Senate that there is one point that seems to have been overlooked. It has been said that it would be rather easy either to transfer the staff or transfer the members of the special committee and scatter them among either the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments or the Committee on Armed Services. I believe, however, that those who make such statements lose sight of one thing. The situation is somewhat like that of a football team. If the members of the special committee team, which has worked together over a period of years and is composed both of Members of the Senate and of the professional staff, were spread around, the same effectiveness would not be secured.

In my opinion, with the tremendous expenditures of the Federal Government which are now under way and which will continue under the President's budget, which proposes an expenditure of some thirty-seven and one-half billion dollars, there will be ample work to keep the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments busy investigating the current expenses of the Government of the United States.

If we believe there is a job to be done investigating past expenditures, then I believe the only way it is going to be done is to have the investigation conducted by a special committee. If such a committee did not now exist, Mr. President, and if the American people and the Senate of the United States wanted to have done the job of investigating what became of the $400,000,000,000 spent during the war, there would be a need for creating a committee to do the very thing that the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program is set up to do.

I now wish to call attention to the fact that the type of staff used on a special investigating committee is different from the type of staff normally used in connection with a legislative committee considering the current problems of the Government and working on current legislation. An investigating committee, such as the special committee in question, requires investigators. We have on the staff of that committee individuals who were formerly with the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Such a committee requires individuals who are familiar with war-fraud type of investigation and of income-tax evasion type of investigation. The normal staff of a Senate committee or of a House committee would not have among its number experts of that character. I believe we will lose the momentum which is under way, which the special committee now has, if we terminate its life and refuse to permit it to proceed.

I desire also to call the attention of the Members of the Senate to the fact that there are a number of factors that would cut across the various committee lines. As we travel about or as we hold our investigations we find that one thing ties into another. In holding an investigation on the disposal of surplus property overseas we might tie into information that leads us on to something else. When we have an integrated investigating committee of this kind we are better able to proceed and follow the tracks wherever they may lead.

The able Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR] has read an editorial from the Washington Post, one of the leading newspapers of the United States, and a newspaper for which I have the highest respect; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to an editorial which the same newspaper published on December 31, 1945. I shall ask that the entire editorial be placed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks, but I want to read to the Senate a couple of paragraphs from the editorial. It is headed "Army hoarding." I read as follows:

Far too little attention has been given to the Army's hoarding program which has now been upset by the Mead committee and the Hodges board. Senator Mead told the story more than a week ago before the adjournment of Congress. Since it involves a glaring case of official misrepresentation as well as shocking disregard for the general welfare we think it should not be allowed to pass with the casual treatment thus far given to it.

I might say at this point that I was rather amazed when my able colleague, the Senator from Idaho, suggested that the investigation of the administrative branch could best be done by another section of the executive branch of the Government. Certainly it is not the customary practice to turn the administration loose to investigate itself. I believe that as it was our responsibility as Senators of the United States to provide the vast sums of money which were necessarily spent during the war, and to provide the current expenditures of some $37,500,000,000, we, as Senators of the United States, have a responsibility to investigate to see how the money is spent. We do not have the right to pass that job on to the executive branch of the Government which is doing the spending.

I continue reading the editorial from the Washington Post of the date I mentioned. It concludes by saying the following:

The results of this one investigation more than justify the existence of the Mead committee and point to the necessity of continuing its work throughout the demobilization period.

I now ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARMY HOARDING

Far too little attention has been given to the Army's hoarding program which has now been upset by the Mead committee and the Hodges board. Senator Mead told the story more than a week ago before the adjournment of Congress. Since it involves a glaring case of official misrepresentation as well as shocking disregard for the general welfare, we think it should not be allowed to pass with the casual treatment thus far given to it.

The hoarding policy began with a War Department directive last September 14 forbidding officers to declare various items surplus until huge reserves had been built up. The purpose was to accumulate reserves large enough to supply the Army through the period of demobilization, during the period of the occupation of Germany and Japan, during the peacetime years and for "the first year of the next war." When the Mead committee learned of the plan, it held a number of hearings. At one of these, several reporters misunderstood a War Department table of reserves in civilian-type goods. They thought it represented actual hoarding of the items named, whereas it reflected only what the Army intended to accumulate before releasing any of its stocks in those categories as surplus. To correct this impression the War Department issued a press release on December 5, but this statement was more misleading than the erroneous stories had been.

Instead of having enormous quantities of the goods in question on hand, the release said, the Department had on hand only very small quantities—sufficient to last for 12 days to 18 months. This information, according to Senator Mead, was based on the stocks in Army depots in the United States. The release neglected to state that vast quantities of the same items may be found in Army posts, camps, and stations in the United States, in depots in foreign combat theaters and in the hands of troops both in this country and abroad.

The flagrant character of the deception effected by this release is illustrated by the statement that the Army had blankets enough to last only 3.7 months. The Hodges board has since made plain that the Army will have enough blankets to supply it until June 30, 1949, and can in addition immediately release 2,000,000 as surplus. Senator Mead's condemnation of this offense against accuracy and the whole truth in the conduct of the public business was altogether too mild in our opinion. None of the officers who have testified before the committee would accept any responsibility for the release. We think that the committee is under obligation to follow up its demand for a full report and the Army must punish its double-talking information men to maintain its own self-respect.

Scarcely less shocking is the fact that the War Department planned to withhold from the market vast quantities of surplus tractors, shovel cranes, service boots, blankets, flashlights, watches, and so forth, that are urgently needed in our civilian economy. Some of these items were to be kept for use as late as 1970. It is estimated that civilian items to be placed in reserve under the original plan would be worth about a billion dollars. Yet no careful study had been made of the cost of transporting and reconditioning these items for storage, of the deterioration that would take place or the interest costs on such a long investment of borrowed money. Apparently the Army went ahead with its hoarding plan without a thought of the public interest.

After the Mead committee began its investigation, the War Department appointed General Hodges chairman of a special board to review the strategic reserve program. His first report, which has been adopted by the War Department, will result in the immediate release of $400,000,000 worth of civilian-type supplies now held in the United States. It is estimated that another $400,000,000 worth of such items will be added to Army surpluses available to the public later. All of the vast hoard of service boots and bleaching material will be given up under the Hodges plan as well as 52,222,000 of the 54,071,000 wool blankets. The results of this one investigation more than justify the existence of the Mead committee and point to the necessity of continuing its work throughout the demobilization period.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I previously mentioned, during the address made by the able Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], an executive committee hearing which the special committee held with General Clay.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. With reference to the Washington Post editorial from which the Senator from California has just read, let me ask him if it is not true that the present policy, recently adopted, is to abandon all investigations of war matters?

Mr. KNOWLAND. At present all investigations of current War Department matters will now be handled by the Armed Services Committee. Any matters overseas will now be handled by the Armed Services Committee. But during the period of time discussed by the editorial that was not the case. The investigating committee performed a service which no other committee had performed in calling the hoarding situation to the attention of the Senate and the people of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I do not see why the able Senator from California complains about the newspaper changing its position when the majority side of the Senate has changed its position.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am not complaining about the newspaper changing its position, but inasmuch as a recent editorial has been read, I thought it would be enlightening to the Senate to know what, a short period before, the same newspaper had said about the very able and capable work which was being carried on by the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. That was my only point.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Yes; but, of course, the editor who wrote the newspaper editorial could not quite keep up with the rapid changes and the fast maneuvering that goes on here.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. What is the date of that Washington Post editorial to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I gave the date before reading it, so there would be no misunderstanding on that point. The date was December 31, 1945.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. TAYLOR. The last line of the editorial, if I correctly understood the distinguished Senator from California, stated that the committee should be continued throughout the demobilization period.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that while the President of the United States recently—a few days ago, in fact—declared that hostilities were at an end, we have not yet declared that the war is at an end, or that the national emergency is at an end.

During the period of time when the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program held one of its hearings we had General Clay before us. I cite this because I think it is the type of thing which the American people have not yet had brought to their attention and in which, as citizens and taxpayers, they have a vital interest. It makes no difference to me as a personal matter whether the job of investigation is done by the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program or whether it be done by a standing committee of the Senate. Personally, I believe it will be done only if it is done by the special committee. Certainly we as individual Senators have a grave obligation, should the Senate not continue the special investigating committee, to see to it that some committee of this body investigates the various matters which the special committee has uncovered, or with respect to which it has leads looking toward items which need investigation.

I read from the record of the hearing on page 29:

Senator KNOWLAND. Is there any check on the amount of allied military marks that may have come into our zone from either the Russian or the British zones and which had to be redeemed by the American military authorities in American dollars, and to that extent was a charge on the American taxpayers?

General CLAY. We know how many we hold. We have more than we have actually issued.

Senator FERGUSON. Could anyone other than an American soldier or civilian obtain United States dollars for the allied money?

General CLAY. No, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND. Is the amount of the allied military marks that we issued and the amount that we hold military secrets or is it something we could disclose?

General CLAY. No, sir. We have those figures not only for our own zone but also the British and the French zones. We have never been able to obtain the figures from the Soviet zone.

Senator KNOWLAND. What did we issue in our zone?

General CLAY. I wouldn't be able to give you those exact figures. I think it was in the neighborhood of about two billion, of which about half had come back into our Treasury.

Mr. MEADER. Two billion marks or dollars?

General CLAY. Marks.

Senator FERGUSON. We have cashed about one-half of that?

General CLAY. Yes, sir.

* * * * * *

Senator KNOWLAND. What is the highest denomination of the allied mark?

General CLAY. One hundred marks.

Senator KNOWLAND. A 100-mark note?

General CLAY. Yes, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND. How many notes of 500, 1,000, or 10,000 marks are there in the American zone?

General CLAY. Very large quantities.

Senator KNOWLAND. Which is indicative that they were not issued by the American authorities.

General CLAY. Yes, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND. What is the largest denomination that the British issued?

General CLAY. One hundred, also.

Senator KNOWLAND. You say that about one billion has been returned to our Treasury over there. About how much of that would be of denominations over 100 marks?

General CLAY. I know that it was substantial, sir.

I merely wish to cite the fact that in this field alone we have a situation in which the American taxpayer has apparently been called upon to redeem large quantities of occupation military marks which were obviously not issued in the American zone, because the American Government does not issue marks in denominations higher than 100 marks. They were not from the British zone, because the British do not issue military marks in denominations greater than 100 marks. And yet our zone has been flooded with huge quantities of marks of denominations of 500, 1,000, or 10,000 marks.

This is one fact which had been kept from the American people; and I believe that some committee of the Senate—it may be the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, or the Committee on Armed Services, or the special committee, or would have been the special committee except for the limitations that we have now accepted—some committee has a grave responsibility to the American people to furnish them with the full facts as to how much of a burden they may have assumed in helping to subsidize the Russian zone in the occupation territory.

I also wish to invite attention to the fact that when our committee was overseas I went with the then Senator from Delaware, Mr. Tunnell, on a 30,000-mile trip around the world, investigating the disposal of Army and Navy surplus property abroad. Largely as a result of our findings we were able to expedite the return of a large quantity of surplus commodities which were urgently needed in the civilian economy of this country during the period when we had a short supply. In the islands of the Pacific, in the Orient, and in Europe we found large quantities of tractors which were vitally needed by veterans on farms as well as by municipal and State governments in highway work, and also needed by the public in the construction of homes and in construction work generally. Yet when they could not obtain these items, tractors were practically being given away, on the basis of 10 cents on the dollar, more or less, or were left to rust in distant places. Largely as a result of what we uncovered on that trip, we were able to get the Government departments and agencies to start returning much of that usable equipment to this country, where it could be put to use. I believe that every Senator has had the experience of having constituents write to him, representing either the highway department of a State or county or individual veterans and others who have been desperately in need of tractors of one kind or another. Yet recently when our chief counsel was overseas he found a situation in which the American authorities had permitted the delivery of $1,300,000 worth of tractors to a British firm which had taken delivery of them and had removed them from France across the channel into Great Britain. We found that those tractors had not yet been paid for, and as of today they have not yet been paid for.

Yet when an American veteran or an American farmer tries to get a tractor he must pay for it on the spot at the place of sale.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not also true in that particular case that the rules and regulations required payment prior to delivery, and that payment was not made? Delivery was made in violation of the orders and regulations; and, so far as we have learned, there has been no disciplinary action against those who permitted delivery of thousands of dollars' worth of tractors, or even a couple of million dollars' worth of tractors. So we find that the agencies will not police themselves. They will not look into the various transactions and really perform their duty. Therefore it was necessary for the committee to do that kind of work, and it will continue to do the job of policing the various agencies, because they refuse to police themselves. Is not that true?

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator from Michigan is absolutely correct. In this particular case, as the Senator has pointed out, the situation is that the regulations and requirements provide that payment shall be made prior to delivery. However, delivery was made to the British firm and the tractors were transported across the channel. Permission was given by someone in one of the Government agencies to do an illegal act. To date we have not been able to find out whether disciplinary action has been taken.

I may add that the latest information I have is that finally, after the matter was called to the attention of the proper authorities, they filed some type of injunctive proceedings in the British courts in order to prevent disposal of the tractors which are now on the British side of the channel.

I merely cite this as one of several examples. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] has cited others, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] has cited others. They are things which need to be gone into by the Senate of the United States in discharging the high obligation it owes to the American people. I say to Senators, including the able Senator from Idaho, that I do not believe that the type of investigative work which is so necessary to the taxpayers of the country can be done if the job is turned over to one of the administrative agencies of the Federal Government.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I am in doubt as to the number of Senators who would be on the special Senate committee if resolution 46 were adopted.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The number would be 10, the same number as have been on the committee.

Mr. MORSE. How many of the 10 would be new appointees?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Four would be new appointees.

Mr. MORSE. Four who had never served on the committee before?

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator is correct. That point was raised and answered, perhaps before the Senator arrived.

Mr. MORSE. I am sorry I did not hear the point raised. I should like to say to the Senator from California that I have followed his argument very carefully, and I think there is a great deal of merit in it. However, the most important issue is still before us. The Senate still has to decide what is the most efficient way to proceed with the war contract investigation, which I think the American people are entitled to have consummated by the Senate at the earliest possible time.

It seems to me that if we are to have a committee of 10, including 4 new members—I understand that some of the members of the present committee are Senators who have served a relatively short time on the committee—we shall have a committee representing a considerable amount of inexperience on the part of a substantial number of the members. If I am correctly informed, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has on it some of the already proven investigators of the Senate, who would bring to their colleagues on that committee a considerable amount of experience and investigatory background. I see no reason why the most competent of the investigation staff could not be transferred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Furthermore, with my mind still undecided as to what decision we ought finally to adopt, may I point out that the argument to the effect that standing committees are very busy committees should be very carefully scrutinized. I say that because the real point is that individual Senators are very busy men, whether they are on special committees or on standing committees. When the Senate places a Senator on a special committee it is simply giving to him a job on a special committee which he would still perform if he did the same work on a subcommittee of a standing committee. After all, 96 Members of this body can do just so much work, whether it be done on a special committee or on a subcommittee of a standing committee.

I think the argument which has been made by some Senators to the effect that we are going to encumber the work of a standing committee if we send this type of work to a standing committee is fallacious. After all, each of us, no matter where he is assigned, is able to do just so much work within so much time and with so much energy to expend. As a general principle I think we will save the time of individual Senators and of standing committees if we channel these investigations through a subcommittee of a standing committee.

So I think we have got to go back to the real issue which is involved in this controversy, and that is, if this job needs to be done—and it does need to be done—how can it be done most effectively, most efficiently, and in the shortest possible time in the interest of the country? If we proceed by way of a special committee, we must make sure that it is surrounded with all the restrictions that are needed, so as not establish a precedent which will undermine the Reorganization Act.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in the concluding portion of the remarks of the Senator from California the thought was expressed that the job of investigation could not be done by administrative departments; that administrative departments could not be trusted to police themselves.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Let me say at this point that no reflection upon the present administration was intended except that as a matter of policy no executive department of the Government should be expected to conduct such an investigation. I think Congress has the prime responsibility of doing that as a matter of public policy.

Mr. HATCH. I do not disagree with the thought or policy at all, but I am puzzled. I noticed that the Senator from California mentioned the Senator from Idaho. I listened to his speech and I did not hear him express such a thought. Has any one proposed that the Senate should abandon its duties and leave the policing to the administrative branch?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I certainly understood the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], in the course of his remarks, to suggest that as a possibility the Department of Justice or one of the other departments of the Government might be better equipped to do this investigative work.

PORTAL-TO-PORTAL PAY

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, the commerce of the United States is now in a state of semiconfusion because of the portal-to-portal pay cases. I have been listening to the testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee for some time, and there seems to be quite a difference of opinion among the learned lawyers who are testifying as to what should be done to untangle the condition that now exists. I have prepared two amendments which I believe, if enacted, would straighten this matter out. One amendment is to the Fair Labor Standards Act. It would simply make it plain, so that there would be no further misunderstanding in connection with portal-to-portal pay rates. The other amendment which I intend to propose is an amendment to House bill 71, amending the Internal Revenue Act. This would effectively settle the portal-to-portal dispute in case the bills which have been introduced should fail. The amendment which I intend to propose to the Internal Revenue Act simply provides that in cases in which suits are brought for the collection of portal-to-portal pay, any moneys recovered through such suits shall be subject to a 100-percent tax by the Federal Government. That might discourage the filing of such suits. Furthermore, the amendment would provide that anyone compelled to pay a claim on suits filed under this portal-to-portal pay requirement would be entitled to deduct the amount he paid from the amount he owed the Government on his 1947 income tax, and to carry the balance, if any, over to future years, for 5 years, until he recovered all he had been forced to pay. Mr. President, this method of recovering windfall money was adopted by Congress when the processing tax was declared unconstitutional. The money left in the hands of processors for which they had rendered no service was taxed nearly 100 percent. I hope the method I am proposing will be adopted promptly, so that the burden and uncertainty of commerce may be relieved.

Mr. President, I ask that two amendments which I send to the desk be properly referred and be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. O'DANIEL to the bill (S. 70) to exempt employers from liability for portal-to-portal wages in certain cases, and for other purposes, was received, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the proper place insert the following:

"SEC. —. (a) Section 7 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(e) As used in this section, the term "workweek" shall include only the time during which an employee is engaged in productive work. In determining productive work (1) time consumed in going to and returning from work stations (except in cases where transportation is furnished by the employer and by custom in the industry or by agreement between the parties such travel time is compensable), and (2) time consumed in changing clothing and in preparing for productive work, shall not be included.'

"(b) Hereafter, no action for the recovery of wages, penalties, or other damages (actual, liquidated, or exemplary) shall be commenced under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 in any court by reason of any time spent by any employee in other than productive work."

There being no objection, the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. O'DANIEL to the bill (H. R. 71) to amend the Interial Revenue Code, act of February 10, 1939, was received, referred to the Committee on Finance, ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following new sections:

"SEC. —. The Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding after section 15 the following new section:

"'SEC. 16. Tax on Unjust Enrichment.

"'(a) Imposition of tax: There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the windfall income of every individual a tax of 100 percent of the amount of his windfall income.

"'(b) Windfall income: For the purposes of this chapter, the term 'windfall income' means amounts received by any individual during the taxable year as wages, penalties, or other damages (actual, liquidated, or exemplary) under an order of a court of competent jurisdiction in accordance with the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, if liability for the payment of such amounts would not have been incurred had section 7 (e) of such act been in effect on and after the effective date of such act.'

"SEC. —. The Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding after section 22 the following new section:

"'SEC. 22A. Additional exclusion from gross income: Amounts received during the taxable year as windfall income shall not be included in gross income.'

"SEC. —. The Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding after section 35 the following new section:

"'SEC. 36. Credit for Windfall Income Payments.

"'There shall be allowed as a credit against the tax, amounts paid during the taxable year as wages, penalties, or other damages (actual, liquidated, or exemplary) under an order of a court of competent jurisdiction in accordance with the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, if liability for the payment of such amounts would not have been incurred had section 7 (e) of such Act been in effect on and after the effective date of such Act.'

"SEC. —. The amendments to the Internal Revenue Code made by section — to — shall apply to taxable years commencing after December 31, 1946."

The Senate resumed consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 46) continuing the authority for the investigation of the national defense program.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to address myself in support of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] to the pending resolution.

We all agree that when the Joint Committee on Reorganization of Congress, of which I had the honor to be a member almost from its inception, reported to the Senate the proposed reform of the Senate rules, it contained a flat prohibition against special committees. In fact, the language of the act as reported by the special committee, and later adopted by the Senate, contained the following provision:

> No bill or resolution, and no amendment to any bill or resolution, to establish or to continue a special or select committee, including a joint committee, shall be received or considered in either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

It was pointed out by the able chairman of the committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin at the time, Mr. La Follette, that the reason for the specific prohibition against special committees was the feeling on the part of the joint committee that if there were not a flat prohibition, just such proposals as those before the Senate today would be repeatedly made and often adopted. So that the Senate might be relieved of that temptation and of that inclination the joint committee reported that there should be a flat prohibition against special committees. It was provided, however, that that prohibition could be removed in a very clear-cut and simple way, namely, for the Senate by a two-thirds vote to waive the rule prohibiting special committees.

So, the joint committee after months of study reported to the Senate that there should not be special committees appointed by either House, unless the rule should be waived by a two-thirds vote prior to the adoption of a resolution authorizing a special committee.

We all know that when that provision was considered by the Senate it was approved by the Senate by a vote of 48 to 16; and I had the honor, as others have indicated they did, to be one of those favoring that prohibition against the special committee.

The reasons are elaborately given in the hearings before the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress as to why it was desirable to abolish special committees, and one of the reasons was the item of expense. It is only natural that a special committee should employ new personnel, and as a general rule—and I think the statement can be confirmed by the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] who was chairman in the last Congress of the Audit and Control Committee, and who is now on the floor—the personnel of the special committees receive compensation far in excess of that enjoyed by the personnel of the standing committee. Is that not a fact, I will ask the able former chairman of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Florida is eminently correct and when the time comes that the Senator from Illinois may have an opportunity, as he will, to discuss this question, I propose at that time to go into each and every special committee that was active at the time the reorganization bill was passed, showing the number of their employees and the amount of money spent by them. Almost every so-called important special committee has had as many, and as a matter of fact, in numerous instances, a far greater number of employees than the standing committees.

Mr. PEPPER. I think the able Senator.

So the first and one of the signficant reasons for the prohibition of the special committee, recommended by the Joint Committee on the Organization of the Congress, was to save expense in the employment of new personnel, which ordinarily received far in excess of the compensation received by the personnel of the standing committee. Furthermore, it was to promote efficiency, because the work of the special committee often and generally overlapped the work of some general committee of the Congress.

The second important reason, Mr. President, why the Joint Committee recommended a ban upon the special committee was that the Senators themselves might not be burdened with membership upon a multiplicity of important committees. If I may make a personal reference, I believe I was a member of 10 active committees in the last session of the Congress, when all the special committees of which I was a member were functioning, along with my regular committees and the subcommittees and the regular committees of which I was a member. I know mine was not an exceptional case. As has well been said by other Senators who have spoken so ably on this subject one of the principal objectives we sought to achieve by the streamlining of the congressional committees was to make it possible for Senators to attend to their committee business.

We are now proposing to set up a multiplicity of committees.

The able Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] no doubt would be the chairman of the Special Committee on War Investigation. I read in the press a day or two ago that he had been appointed chairman of a subcommittee to investigate safety in air travel. The able Senator is to be commended for his interest in the safety of people who travel in the airplanes of the commercial air lines. That is a big job, a principal investigating task, which has already been assigned to the able Senator from Maine by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MCMAHON. I wonder why it was that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] did not suggest the formation of a special committee to investigate the subject of safety in air travel.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not know why the Senator from Maine did not make such a suggestion, unless he did not wish to claim for himself the jewel of consistency in his approach to this matter. So, Mr. President, that is one committee which might be called special in character with which the Senator from Maine is already charged, and which will carry him rather outside the scope of his duties on the regular committee into a vast field of inquiry.

The Senator from Maine is a member, of course, of two important regular committees of the Senate, and no doubt, because of his energy and ability, he will be appointed chairman of other subcommittees of those regular committees, or certainly he will be a member of subcommittees of his regular committees. I dare say that even if the able and energetic Senator from Maine performs only his regular committee duties he will discharge a very great obligation to the Senate and will tax even his own great capacity.

He now proposes to launch upon an inquiry that is probably larger than any of the others, an inquiry, the limit of which can hardly be imagined, as it will no doubt work out in practice.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Florida has just been discussing a very important question with respect to airplane accidents and casualties which seems to me to be a very appropriate subject of investigation. I am wondering whether the Senator from Florida would care to comment on what the Senator from Maine might have done had a Republican Senator or a Democratic Senator submitted a resolution proposing to set up a special committee to investigate airplane accidents.

Mr. PEPPER. Knowing the diligence of the Senator from Maine, I can hardly imagine any Senator being on his feet ahead of him to protest against the grievous transgression of the jurisdiction of the regular committee that such a proposal would have constituted.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that under the procedure of the Senate, prior to the adoption of the Reorganization Act, if any Senator had desired to submit a resolution setting up a special committee to examine into airplane accidents, he could have found ample precedents for so doing. I recall resolutions under which such committees have been appointed in the past.

Mr. PEPPER. Undoubtedly so. That simply emphasizes that if we once start again the evil practice of creating special committees, there is no limit to it.

I have as a part of the hearings of the joint committee the testimony of a House Member who said that already 17 special committees of one sort or another were functioning in the Congress. Today it happens to be the able Senator from Maine who proposes that the Senate create a special committee to investigate the conduct of the war. Incidentally, the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] has indicated that there should be hardly any limits to the scope of such a study. I do not know but that he may have in the back of his mind the prolongation of the committee on the Pearl Harbor inquiry, because I got the impression that the Senator from Michigan was not satisfied, owing to the fact that that committee had seemed to exculpate President Roosevelt from the responsibility of entertaining a sinister design to get this country into the war, and that the able Senator from Michigan thought probably that inquiry should be further pursued.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I will yield in a moment.

If the special committee were created, and if he were a member of it, I am sure that the able Senator from Michigan would consider it was perfectly within the range of the activities of the committee contemplated by the Senator from Maine to try to project the inquiry into the material that was otherwise fully and lengthily considered by the committee to investigate the Pearl Harbor circumstances.

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. McMAHON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield first to the Senator from Maryland, and then I shall yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. TYDINGS. Following the remark of the able Senator from Florida, that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] is already on two important committees, I note he is on the Committee on Finance, and that he is on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Merely considering the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, there will be subcommittees of that committee, no doubt, dealing with railroads, with pipe lines, with the telegraph and telephone, with aviation, with radio, with television, with intercoastal shipping, and with all that tremendous variety of subjects which after a war will come to the fore. I should hate to think that the energies of the Senator from Maine would be taken from the Interstate Commerce Committee, for there are only seven members of his party on that committee now, under the Reorganization Act, and only, as I recall, six Democrats. Now, with this reduced committee size and with the subcommittee work that must flow from the reduction of the committee membership there seems to me to be an additional and all-abundant reason why a special committee ought not to be created. I do not believe the Senator from Maine can do the work on the two committees of which he is a member, and undertake this other work which will take him all over the United States, much against his will, for he will have work to do here also.

With respect to the work of the Finance Committee, we find all the wartime taxes, with a possible 20-percent reduction in personal income taxes, with a need for balancing the budget, and yet the Committee on Finance has only seven Republican members. So, frankly, if the Senator from Maine is leaving to perform work elsewhere, the committee complexion will be six Republicans and six Democrats on each of the two main committees of which he is a member. The Senator from Maine should know that it is not going to be wise to leave matters in that situation, because we Democrats might take control of those two committees at some time if the Senator from Maine were in Idaho or California or Maryland looking for matters to investigate in connection with the defense program.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Maryland. Since he has called attention to the fact that the distinguished Senator from Maine is a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and a member of the Committee on Finance, let me read the jurisdiction of the two committees as set forth in the rules of the Senate itself as part of the act reorganizing the Congress. Here is the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

1. Interstate and foreign commerce generally.
2. Regulation of interstate railroads, busses, trucks, and pipe lines.
3. Communication by telephone, telegraph, radio, and television.
4. Civil acronautics.
5. Merchant marine generally.
6. Registering and licensing of vessels and small boats.
7. Navigation and the laws relating thereto, including pilotage.
8. Rules and international arrangements to prevent collisions at sea.
9. Merchant marine officers and seamen.
10. Measures relating to the regulation of common carriers by water and to the inspection of merchant marine vessels, lights and signals, life-saving equipment, and fire protection on such vessels.
11. Coast and Geodetic Survey.
12. The Coast Guard, including life-saving service, lighthouses, lightships, and ocean derelicts.
13. The United States Coast Guard and Merchant Marine Academies.
14. Weather Bureau.

I am sure the able Senator from Maine might even be interested in the inclination of the weathervanes to indicate certain aspects of the weather in this country.

15. Except as provided in paragraph (c), the Panama Canal and interoceanic canals generally.
16. Inland waterways.
17. Fisheries and wild life, including research, restoration, refuges, and conservation.

I may say that I am sure the able Senator from Maine is interested not only in fisheries, but also in fishing, as I will be able to indicate in a moment, according to some of the patterns made by the inquiries of the committee itself previously, and suggestions made by the Senator from Maine while he was a member of the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator does not mean to intimate that the Senator from Maine is not also interested in wildlife?

Mr. PEPPER. I am sure he is.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I wish to complete a reading of the list, and then I shall be glad to yield.

18. Bureau of Standards, including standardization of weights and measures and the metric system.

It took Congress a good long while to figure out some of those standards, I believe.

Mr. President, I have just read 18 subjects of jurisdiction under the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce alone, of which the able Senator from Maine is a member, and a subcommittee of which he has already been named chairman, and obviously there will have to be other subcommittees of that committee, of which so able and important a majority member as the Senator from Maine will necessarily be a member.

Let me now read the jurisdiction of the Committee on Finance:

1. Revenue measures generally.

As the Senator from Maryland has pointed out, the whole tax system of this country.

2. The bonded debt of the United States.
3. The deposit of public moneys.
4. Customs, collection districts, and ports of entry and delivery.
5. Reciprocal trade agreements.
6. Transportation of dutiable goods.
7. Revenue measures relating to the insular possessions.
8. Tariffs and import quotas, and matters related thereto.
9. National social security.
10. Veterans' measures generally.
11. Pensions of all the wars of the United States, general and special.
12. Life insurance issued by the Government on account of service in the armed forces.
13. Compensation of veterans.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOWLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. PEPPER. I will yield in a moment. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has 18 enumerated subdivisions of jurisdiction and the Committee on Finance has 13 enumerated subdivisions of jurisdiction, and the Senator from Maine is already on both those committees. The principal purpose of the limitation against special committees which the Senate first adopted was to keep from breaking down even the exceptional capacity of a Senator like the Senator from Maine, and encourage Senators to become experts in all the many fields of service in connection with committees and enable them to perform their services with credit in their positions.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to ask the Senator only one question. After I reflect on what he has just read, I believe the Senate made a mistake. I am sure it would have been wiser to have put a Senator on one committee only, because if he attended to the work of that one committee, and worked to cover the scope of the committee surely he would have his hands full. Then to put him on two committees and then even to put him on an extra committee is too much. He simply cannot do the job, even though he is as superhuman as is the Senator from Maine.

Mr. PEPPER. What the Senator from Maryland has just said is borne out by the fact that for years the House of Representatives has followed the practice of having a Member sit on only one important committee. I heard the Senator from Illinois the other day in the Committee on Agriculture say that by virtue of that fact, while he served as a member of the Committee on Agriculture in the House of Representatives, he learned more about agriculture during that time because he could devote his attention to that subject, than he had ever learned in any other period of his public life.

Mr. McMAHON and Mr. FERGUSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the interest of proper order in the Senate, the Chair would like to call attention of Senators to the procedure which under the Senate rules should be followed, of Senators first addressing the Chair, if the Senator who has the floor is to be interrupted, so that the Presiding Officer may ask him whether he desires to be interrupted, rather than carrying on a conversation back and forth in the Chamber itself.

Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question. He has read a list of the matters that come within the jurisdiction of the two committees, the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. I just heard the Senator who now occupies the chair, the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] ask the distinguished Senator from Florida whether he desired to yield to the Senator from Michigan. Has the Senator yielded to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. PEPPER. No; I said I yielded first to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WHERRY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he said he yielded to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. PEPPER. No. The Senator from Michigan was the second Senator to request that I yield to him.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I should like to point out to the Senator from Florida that the jurisdiction which is conferred on these two committees involves a great deal of hard and grinding, but necessary, work. I have in my hand the Evening Star for Friday, today, and I see a headline: "BREWSTER sees new sensations if war investigators continue."

I have read the story. I point out to the Senator that there is nothing of an assurance in it that if this special committee is continued there will be a fair, diligent, honest effort to catch any crooks no matter where they might be, but we are promised a sensation a day. I wonder if the Senator from Florida thinks that after the Senator from Maine has read the list of jurisdictions and the duties of the two committees to which he is assigned and then sees the glowing prospect of a sensation a day, as the Star puts it, that would have any effect upon the desires of the Senator from Maine in this matter.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Maine should be given the opportunity to excite the glamour-loving people of the country by disclosing one new sensation a day. I think they are doing fairly well now with the number of sensations they already have available to them.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. It is apparent that the remarks of the able Senator from Florida were for the purpose of denying permission to the junior Senator from Michigan to reply to his remarks in relation to the Pearl Harbor investigation. I wish to put the mind of the able Senator from Florida at rest. The junior Senator from Michigan has no desire at the present time to attempt to reopen the Pearl Harbor investigation, because of the fact that there is in existence an Executive order by the President of the United States which makes it impossible to complete the investigation of the Pearl Harbor incident. Therefore so far as the able Senator from Florida is concerned, there is no danger, if this resolution is agreed to, that there will be an investigation of the Pearl Harbor incident under the resolution.

However, the junior Senator from Michigan believes that the time will come in the history of the United States when it will be possible to look into the files of the Secretary of State, the Army and Navy files, and the executive files, in order that the people of the United States may know all the facts in relation to Pearl Harbor. History demands that the white light of investigation be thrown upon any incident about which the people should know. I have no desire at the present time to follow up that inquiry; but the time will come in the future when the people will learn, if it is possible to obtain the information from the files, the whole story of the Pearl Harbor incident, and how we could be attacked without being ready for the attack.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the able Senator from Michigan for his statement. I had been impressed by the breadth of some of the statements which the Senator from Michigan made in his address on this subject a few days ago. If I recall correctly, he made a statement about the time of the election, or about the time of the conclusion of the Pearl Harbor investigation to the effect that there should be further investigation of the subject. So I thought from what the Senator had said that if this committee were re-created he might avail himself of the committee to make such an inquiry.

Mr. FERGUSON. I merely wish to say that Senators on the other side of the aisle can rest assured that if this resolution is agreed to, so far as the junior Senator from Michigan is concerned, there will be no investigation into the Pearl Harbor incident, as to how we could be attacked without anticipating the attack.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no desire to rehash the circumstances surrounding the Pearl Harbor investigation. That investigation lasted for nearly a year. It was made by a joint committee of the two Houses. On that joint committee there were six members of the majority and four members of the minority. When the joint committee had finished its investigation and made its report 8 of the 10 members of the joint committee signed the report. Two members did not sign it, but filed minority views, based very largely upon the fact that the committee, by a nonpartisan vote, decided not to require the production of the private diary of the Secretary of War and the private diary of the Ambassador to Japan for 10 years, and also did not undertake to override the Executive order of the President that the private files of the President of the United States should not be invaded by the committee for fishing purposes. I will say in fairness to the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Maine that throughout the investigation they insisted that the diary of the Secretary of War and the diary of the Ambassador to Japan, as well as the private papers of the President of the United States be looked into for anything pertinent to the inquiry. Everything thought to be pertinent was submitted. There was disagreement on that point. The Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Maine both felt that wider latitude should be given in the inspection of those private documents, or any documents which might be found in the files in those particular repositories.

I do not know whether the committee, if it were re-created, would go into the Pearl Harbor matter or not. I think the overwhelming majority of the committee felt, without regard to politics, that the investigation was one of the most exhaustive investigations ever made by the Senate or by the Congress, if not the most exhaustive. Be that as it may, I do not know what any new committee would seek to do. As I recall, interviews were given out by the Senator from Maine. I do not know whether the Senator from Michigan participated in them or not. There was an intimation in the newspapers that the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program might see fit to undertake to go further into the Pearl Harbor matter. Whether the Senator said that or not I do not know, but he was quoted as saying it.

Mr. BREWSTER and Mr. FERGUSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor. He yielded temporarily to the Senator from Kentucky. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wished to finish one thought.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky, in order that he may finish what he was about to say.

Mr. BARKLEY. Regardless of any intention on the part of any Senator who might be a member of the special committee with respect to reopening the Pearl Harbor investigation, I myself do not take the position which I take on the pending resolution based upon any fear that that committee, if extended, would go into a further examination of the Pearl Harbor incident. Whether it does or does not does not concern me at all in regard to this question. The record of the Pearl Harbor Committee is public. It has made its reports. They stand on their own merits, whatever they may be. Whether the special committee would undertake to go into that question again or not has no influence whatever with me in determining my attitude on the pending resolution. I take it for granted that the committee would not undertake to reopen that matter then, if at all. I suppose the Senator from Michigan had in mind a moment ago that he hoped the time might come when there would be no Executive order which would deprive some committee of the right to invade all the private papers to which reference has been made, which right was denied to him as a result of the Executive order.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is exactly the position of the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. I appreciate the full and frank statement of the Senator from Kentucky, the distinguished minority leader. If any newspaper quoted me as intimating that the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program ever would go into the Pearl Harbor affair, there was absolutely no authority for that statement so far as I am concerned. I appreciate the Senator's statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will yield to me, I will say that a statement to that effect appeared in one of the Washington newspapers. My recollection is that the Senator from Maine was not in the city on the day when that article appeared. My recollection also is that the Senator from Michigan stated in that connection, either on the same day or a day or two afterward, that he did not share in that view, if it was the view of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. This is the first time that I have realized that there was any serious suggestion that the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program had ever had any jurisdiction of that question, because the Pearl Harbor incident occurred before the war started. It was the beginning of the war. I do not know under what tortured construction of language it could even be conceived to be within the jurisdiction of the special committee. At any rate, it has never been suggested in our committee, in the 4 years of its history, and so far as I know it has never been considered by any member of the committee. I think the episode to which the Senator from Kentucky refers may be the result of the occasional statement which has appeared, to which the Senator from Kentucky referred, that neither the Senator from Michigan nor I was satisfied with the extent of our exploration in that case. The items of which the Senator speaks were the conspicuous ones which we felt should have been gone into further.

I entirely concur in the statement of the Senator from Kentucky that the Pearl Harbor investigation was one of the most extensive and exhaustive investigations ever conducted by any committee of the Senate, and I think that as to most of its phases, particularly military and naval affairs, nothing further could have been expected or required. On the diplomatic phase, however, I was not satisfied, as the Senator from Kentucky knows, and I shall not be satisfied until more of the diplomatic history of the events preceding Pearl Harbor is known. Those facts are in the archives. I do not think the Senator from Kentucky means to intimate that papers of the President of the United States on file in our archives are private papers. They are generally recognized as public documents.

I of course do not concur in the suggestion of a "fishing expedition," which seems to me to be a provocative term. The Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Maine earnestly desired an exploration of those affairs by responsible members of the committee, as was constantly stressed, but that was denied. It seems to the Senator from Maine that this is not the time or the place further to extend that discussion; but the record should be clear.

With respect to a quotation which was read this afternoon in the absence from the Chamber of the Senator from Maine referring to a sensation a day, according to the quotation from the newspaper, the only knowledge which the Senator from Maine possesses is the repeated statement made on the floor and elsewhere that since the recent election results were known there has been a greater tendency for some fairly well informed persons of a more responsible character than informants frequently are to supply more details concerning things which, in my judgment, require investigation. There has been a considerable accumulation of such information during the time when the committee has been in a state of suspended animation. Those things have not been substantially explored.

That was the substance of my statement on the floor and to the press. Whatever inferences or conclusions might be drawn, the same procedure would be followed by this committee in the future as in the past, with the most careful exploration of every intimation of this character before any public hearings were held.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I desire merely to make one observation. I associate myself with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] in what he has said about Pearl Harbor and in the position he has taken. I do so because I was a member of that committee. I know what a part of the press of the country is saying. I do not know who is responsible for giving out information of one kind or another, but I know that a hostile press in certain sections of the country at least has said over and over again that there would be another investigation of Pearl Harbor; and the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] said that on two different occasions, according to my memory, during the hearings on the Pearl Harbor incident. As for myself, I do not care how many investigations of Pearl Harbor may be undertaken. Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that nothing in connection with the Pearl Harbor investigation has anything to do with my position today in trying to sustain a congressional reform which has been needed for a period of the past 40 years.

Since the pending resolution has been submitted an effort has been made to convince the public that we on this side of the aisle are attempting to hide or conceal something under a dark, mysterious curtain which is constantly referred to. So far as I am concerned, any activities of the Democratic administration may be probed, investigated, and attacked from now until doomsday, whether relating to Pearl Harbor or otherwise, but one thing I have said consistently and constantly is that whatever the Senate of the United States does in connection with any investigation should be done through a regularly constituted committee or a subcommittee thereof, in line with the purposes and concepts of the Reorganization Act.

I want to make my position plain so far as the Pearl Harbor investigation is concerned. I do not care how much investigating is done. It can continue for another 6 months if it is so desired. If another joint committee of the House and Senate is to investigate, the chances are that the same minority of two will be crying about the Pearl Harbor situation, even when the Republican Senators get the files which they have looked for so long, the files that have been so surreptitiously suppressed. When the words "destroyed," "suppressed," or "concealed" are used it is always possible to get a sensational headline in the daily press. It is easy to say, "Today I talked to a very important military man and he told me there was something suppressed in one of the files that the Senate ought to have." A Senator goes to the press and says, "Here is a sensational item. Someone is concealing something in one of the files."

I see that the Senator from Maine is smiling; he apparently knows what I am talking about. I repeat, any statement made that is concealed or suppressed makes copy. The Senator from Illinois wants the majority to get under the alleged great iron curtain of secrecy, provided it is done by a regular standing committee. At present an attempt is being made to confuse the American people in an effort to gain support for this special committee. Certain Senators want them to think that there has been corruption or extravagance and that the special committee is the only committee that can find out about it. I hope Senators will have a good time fishing in the private and personal files.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield so that I may ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. PEPPER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have before me the amendment, which contains the following language:

Provided further, That the foregoing authority be further limited to transactions which occurred within the United States prior to June 30, 1946.

Just what is meant by that? Does the Senator mean that since the 30th of June 1946 anything that has happened elsewhere in the world can be examined by the committee?

Mr. BREWSTER. No. It limits the activities of the special committee to matters which occurred prior to June 30, 1946; and it further limits the investigation to war frauds, corruption, and matters of that character related to the war effort.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand that, but it says:

Limited to transactions which occurred within the United States.

Mr. BREWSTER. It means such transactions which occurred prior to those dates.

Mr. CONNALLY. How about such transactions since those dates?

Mr. BREWSTER. The authority contained is limited to things which happened prior to that date, within the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I am talking about. Suppose the special committee had been extremely anxious to go to Germany to investigate the military government of Germany, and to go into all matters relating to the administration of affairs in Germany. According to this language, if a matter occurred after June 30, 1946, the committee could not investigate or study it.

Mr. BREWSTER. If the Senator from Texas will read the language somewhat more carefully, I think it will indicate that it is entirely language of limitation, and that nothing outside the recital therein contained could thereafter be within the scope of the investigation.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas has read it a number of times, and while he has great respect for New England literary traditions and ability, he still does not understand it. I wish the Senator would explain it. What about transactions which occurred since June 30, 1946? There is no limitation as to them.

The Senator from Maine could send the committee over to Germany, to find out what happened last July or what General Clay did about this or what General McNarney did about that, and to find out about displaced persons or what the military government is going to do and is doing.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, it appears to me that the Senator from Texas may be overlooking the significance of the comma after the word "therein", which appears at the end of the following language:

With respect to the subject matter authorized to be studied and investigated therein.

What is the limitation? It is limited to "excessive profits, fraud, corruption, waste," and so forth, "connected with the prosecution of the national defense program for World War II" prior to that date. If it is limited to an investigation of those subjects prior to that date, it would seem to me to be clear that the committee could not go outside that scope. This matter has been before the Senate for 2 or 3 days. It was submitted to the Committee on Armed Services, and able Senators on the minority side have given the matter consideration, and the question has not previously been raised. All this argues that possibly the other Senators had interpreted it in the way that the Senator from Maine did. Certainly that was the intention.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator from Maine now give us the assurance that the special committee does not intend to go to Germany or to any other European country to investigate any transactions which have occurred since June 30, 1946?

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Maine is fully authorized by all the surviving members of the committee, other than the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], to give that assurance; and I am sure the Senator from Texas agrees with it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I agree with it. It should have been written into the resolution.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the reason the Pearl Harbor matter came up was the suggestion of the Senator from Florida that the scope of this inquiry would reach to almost unlimited dimensions, and the simple basis of the newspaper reports and suggestions of one sort or another that it might even go so far as to consider certain aspects of the Pearl Harbor inquiry. I wish to make very clear that in no sense of the word was the Senator from Florida suggesting any fear of or resistance to any inquiry on that subject which any authorized agency of this body or of the sister body might care to make. I was speaking about the scope of the inquiry only, in those remarks.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Referring to the remarks of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] regarding the scope of the inquiry and the diplomatic phases, without referring to his suggestion as to the motives in this matter, let me say it was a matter of reassurance to the Senator from Maine and to others interested when he suggested that when the Senate and the people of the country come to know the contents of these diplomatic communications, they would discover that there was nothing unfortunate or undesirable in them. That is rather reassuring as to the future control of that executive department—namely, that sometime we shall find it out. If there is nothing of a character that would be objectionable to those in authority, the more quickly this is disposed of, the more quickly it will cease agitating the public mind. If all is well, there need be no hesitation in permitting this to be known. It seems to me that is the obvious answer to the suggestions of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, one of the things which I wished to emphasize, which is the vice of the special committee, is the practical impossibility of confining its jurisdiction to any reasonable limitation of subjects or authority. The able Senator from Maine, for example, has given us a modified form of his resolution. If I have the proper one before me, as furnished to me by one of the clerks of the Senate, the subject of the inquiry would be limited to the following:

Provided, That on and after the date this resolution is agreed to, the authority contained in such Senate Resolution 71 shall be limited, with respect to the subject matter authorized to be studied and investigated therein, to excessive profits, fraud, corruption, waste, extravagance, mismanagement, incompetence, and inefficiency in expenditures.

It would be limited to all those subjects. If I have any knowledge of grammar, all those matters relate to the subject of expenditures "connected with the prosecution of the national defense program for World War II."

It is further provided:

Provided further, That the foregoing authority shall be further limited to transactions which occurred within the United States (including Hawaii, Alaska, Panama, and Puerto Rico) prior to June 30, 1946.

That is the modification, as I understand, of the able Senator's resolution. Yet, Mr. President, one of the newspapers published this very afternoon, the Washington Evening Star, carries an article over the name of Mr. J. A. O'Leary, certainly, I think, a reporter whom all of us regard as responsible and capable. We find, first, a certain headline and then certain material in the body of the article. I wish to quote first the headline:

BREWSTER sees new sensations if war investigators continue—Will probe special funds and secret report on Senate approval of extension.

Here are a few of the passages in the article by Mr. O'Leary in this afternoon's Evening Star:

New sensations in connection with the cost of the war were promised today by Chairman BREWSTER of the Senate War Investigating Committee if the committee is kept alive another year.

As the Senate neared a vote on the extension the Maine Republican said that if given the go sign he will call on the White House for:

Detailed information on how the late President Roosevelt and President Truman spent about $648,000,000 of special war funds that were clothed with secrecy while the fighting was going on.

A secret mobilization report, prepared before this country entered the war. Senator BREWSTER said Mr. Truman tried without success to get this report while he was chairman of the Senate War Investigating Committee.

If the Senator from Maine will permit me to continue for 4 or 5 minutes, let me say that in this very article, published on this very day, the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] not only is quoted by Mr. O'Leary—and I refer to an article appearing in today's Evening Star—as proposing to inquire about a secret fund handled by the present President of the United States and his predecessor in that office, both of whom were Commanders in Chief of our armed forces in the prosecution of the war, and the fund referred to was to be used in the prosecution of the war, but the article by Mr. O'Leary also quotes the Senator from Maine as proposing to inquire into a secret mobilization report. The article has a little more to say about the secret mobilization report:

Chairman BREWSTER told reporters the committee already has gathered material that would make its earlier investigations look like "small potatoes."

One member of the Cabinet, Senator BREWSTER said, has called to suggest that the committee look into renegotiation of war contracts.

"We want to look over the big fellows, the little fellows and many dummy corporations," Senator BREWSTER declared. "You can be sure that the things to come will make the Garssons and similar exposés seem unimportant."

He was referring to last year's hearings into a group of Garsson munitions companies, whose wartime activities are also being studied by a Federal grand jury.

The secret mobilization report which Senator BREWSTER would like to go into was prepared by Edward B. Stettinius, Jr., while the steel executive was a defense adviser to Mr. Roosevelt before American entrance into the war.

Mr. President, on the very day when we are discussing the limited authority which this special committee is seeking to have, a reputable newspaper and a reputable newspaper reporter quote the able Senator from Maine—I am not saying whether they correctly quote him—as saying that he proposes to inquire into the matter of a special secret fund which was used by the two Commanders in Chief in the prosecution of the recent war, and, secondly, to inquire into a war mobilization report, which to my knowledge has nothing whatever to do with what the Senator from Maine said he would limit the inquiry to, as stated in the resolution—namely, excessive profits, fraud, corruption, waste, extravagance, mismanagement, incompetence, and inefficiency in expenditures, connected with the prosecution of the national defense program.

That is what I was emphasizing. One of these special committees becomes so steamed up, it acquires so much momentum, it falls so much into the psychology of the sensational, that it is almost impossible even for members of it, even for its chairman, to limit its jurisdiction to the subjects which were contemplated when the resolution was adopted by the legislative body.

Mr. LUCAS and Mr. BREWSTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield first to the Senator from Illinois, and then I shall yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that certainly any secret mobilization report prepared by Stettinius or anyone else would have very little to do with the subject matter contained in the pending resolution; but that would not make any difference to the Senator from Maine. That would be just a very small matter once they started investigating.

Mr. BREWSTER. Will not the Senator speak so that we can hear him on this side?

Mr. LUCAS. I say that would make little or no difference to the Senator from Maine. If he thought that was a pertinent matter for inquiry, that it would be a sensation throughout the country, he would not hesitate to investigate, of course.

What I said a moment ago is applicable to the statement in the newspaper as to the secrecy of something that is somewhere in the archives, a mobilization report of some kind or character which fires the imagination of the American people. I do not know what it is. Perhaps it should come out. Neither does the Senator from Maine know what is in that secret report. But his action in giving the statement to the newspaper, so that it is headlined all over the country, I think is not quite fair; "it is not cricket."

Why did he do it? It was done merely because this debate is proceeding today. That is the reason for the sensational headlines about the statements of the Senator from Maine. He wants to make the American people believe that his committee is the only committee that can elicit information as to alleged sensational matters involving far greater inefficiency, extravagance, and waste than was disclosed in the Garsson case.

I think the Senate shculd know about some of these alleged sensational conditions. We ought to have the facts.

Mr. BREWSTER. If the Senator will stop talking, he can find out.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not yield to the Senator at all.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Illinois does not have the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Nor does the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. PEPPER. I have yielded to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, if the committee headed by the Senator from Maine were the only committee in the United States Senate that could bring out all these things, it seems to me they should set forth an agenda of some kind to inform the Senate and the country what they have in mind, instead of proceeding through insinuation and innuendo to fire the imagination of the American people

I know what the then Senator from New York, Mr. Mead, said last year when he asked the Senate for $85,000. Senators who were then members of the Audit and Control Committee know that Senator Mead had a most difficult time laying down an agenda and establishing a budget for $85,000. The committee did not know how or where they were going to spend that money. Senator Mead said definitely that "When the $85,000 is spent and when January 1st comes along, the special committee headed by myself will be a thing of the past." That is what the former chairman of the committee said, and now, overnight, since the Senator from Maine got hold of this committee, colossal sensations are coming along day after day!

Mr. PEPPER. I now yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. I do not wonder there should be some misunderstanding about the mobilization report, for the language of the newspapers might well mislead Senators on the other side. The report referred to an industrial mobilization, and so far as I know that has been made clear in every discussion of the matter, and most of the reporters clearly understood it.

This is not a novel matter, as it has been discussed from time to time here and elsewhere, and the statement of the Senator from Maine has always been that it was an industrial mobilization report, and the final paragraph of the article which the Senator has just read would apparently make this rather clear. This is the statement in that paragraph. I quote:

The secret mobilization report which Senator BREWSTER would like to go into was prepared by Edward B. Stettinius, Jr., while the steel executive was a defense adviser to Mr. Roosevelt before American entrance into the war.

This supplemented the report of Louis Johnson as Acting Secretary of War on industrial organization, and constituted a restudy of that question on the request of the President, and it took on more significance in connection with the study.

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator from Maine will allow me to interrupt at that point, I respectfully submit that, while it might be interesting and pertinent for someone to go into it, I do not consider that if it is an industrial mobilization which the Senator has in mind it would be embraced within the definition of his own resolution "to excessive profits, fraud, corruption, waste, extravagance, mismanagement, incompetence, and inefficiency in expenditures, connected with the prosecution of the national defense program for World War II."

Mr. BREWSTER. It is necessary for the Senator from Maine to suggest that the Senator from Florida has put a construction on the matter which apparently did not appeal to the distinguished former chairman of the committee, Mr. Truman, now the President, as I read from a report made under his jurisdiction on March 3, 1944, on page 4 of the report which I hold in my hand.

Mr. PEPPER. That was the old resolution, which was almost unlimited in the authority it granted, and that resolution has been expressly limited by the amended resolution the Senator from Maine has now proposed. In other words, he has never asked his colleagues to give him the jurisdiction the Truman committee had. He asked only for a limited jurisdiction. So I say that what Senator Truman did under his original broad resolution would not have any pertinence to the limited resolution now before the Senate.

Mr. BREWSTER. If the turbulence of the Senator will permit me to complete my statement——

Mr. PEPPER. I am sorry.

Mr. BREWSTER. It is apparent that under the limited resolution, inefficiency is still within the scope of the committee's function. Is that correct?

Mr. PEPPER. That would include the inefficiency of a general.

Mr. BREWSTER. In procurement.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is not going to limit himself to finding fraud, then? He is going to set up his committee as an appeals committee, to scrutinize and to review the conduct of every man, not whether his conduct was fraudulent or corrupt, but whether he acted in accordance with some standard of efficiency which some efficiency expert might promulgate or lay down.

Mr. BREWSTER and Mr. HATCH addressed the Chair.

Mr. PEPPER. I yield first to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. The question of what comes within the scope of inefficiency and war expenditures may be a matter of argument, but the language which I quote is from Senator Harry S. Truman, as chairman of the special committee, on March 3, 1944, and seems to me to have a distinct relevance. I quote from page 4:

> From its inception, this committee has insisted repeatedly on the need for clear-cut authority centered in single executives rather than multiheaded agencies to administer the war program.

Mark these words:

> The delay of 18 months in establishing such an administrative set-up was responsible for many weaknesses and failures criticized by the committee in the early months of the war effort.

That seems to be an expression of opinion by one whose opinion will not be challenged, that the failure to have a competent administrative set-up was responsible for many weaknesses and failures. Whether or not that is inefficiency may be for any Member of this body to determine, but the securing of the so-called Stettinius report or the earlier report of Louis Johnson, as Acting Secretary of War, regarding industrial mobilization has always been considered a matter of great concern. It was that report which we asked of Mr. Roosevelt as President, during the war, and which he declined to give.

It is that report, which has not been made available to the committee, which has a very decided bearing upon the appraisal of the efficiency of the war procurement program.

Mr. PEPPER. Let me suggest that the failure of this country to have a long-range defense program beginning 20 years ago embarrassed us very much at the beginning of the war, but that would not be within the jurisdiction of this special committee.

Furthermore, the failure of the Congress to provide selective service at an earlier date injured and impaired our ability to defend ourselves when we were attacked, but because that had something to do with our weakness at the time of the Pearl Harbor incident I should not suppose it would be within the jurisdiction of the Senator's committee.

Anything that had to do with our State Department, our foreign policy—all those things might have had a relevancy to the strength of America when war came, but I am talking about what committee now has jurisdiction to investigate.

Mr. BREWSTER. "The inefficiency of war expenditure" is the phrase.

Mr. PEPPER. In order to prove the point I was trying to make, let me say that even under the modified but specific limitation of jurisdiction the Senator from Maine has submitted to his colleagues—and undoubtedly he tried to draft the provision with care—we are debating, I am sure with equal sincerity and honesty on both sides, whether or not the whole industrial mobilization program would be within the proper jurisdiction of this committee. Yet the fact, as the Senator said a moment ago, that the reach of the special committee is so broad, its scope so unlimited, and it may see such pertinency and proximity in such remote causes, makes it almost impossible to limit the jurisdiction of the committee in actual practice.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the senior Senator from Maine?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. I desired to inquire of the Senator from Florida whether he would prefer to terminate his speech this evening, or would it be appropriate to recess at this time or to discuss possibly the question of an agreement as to a time for voting on the pending resolution?

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator from Maine would allow the Senator from Florida about 5 minutes more, he would like to conclude his remarks for this afternoon and resume at the next meeting following this.

Mr. WHITE. I shall yield to the Senator's suggestion of taking 5 minutes more.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, what I have stated is also borne out by the past conduct of the committee. I have referred to the headlines appearing this afternoon in the Evening Star. I have in my hand a copy of Liberty magazine for November 9, 1946, and the headline over an article in a red banner, reads, "Is scandal brewing in Germany?" as any observer can see, in a streamer across the page, "By Senator OWEN BREWSTER."

Here is an excerpt from the article:

> Grave conditions exist in the American occupied zone in Germany, according to the information received by the Senate War Investigating Committee. An intelligence officer of responsible rank and experience gave as his considered judgment that German troops occupying France had made a better record in their personal contacts with the population than have the American troops occupying Germany.

Is it within the scope of a Senate special investigating committee to pass judgment on the American Army as compared with the German Army which had its heel upon the occupied country of France?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to know, and I am sure the Senator from Maine can tell me, where he got the information for that article, whether or not it was taken from the secret report that was brought back by the counsel for the committee, which was supposed to be completely secret so far as the committee was concerned.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. The statement of the Senator from Illinois is as inaccurate as most of the statements he has made this afternoon. The contents of the article were based entirely upon the testimony of an intelligence officer, who, outraged by the things he had observed, came back and asked permission to appear before our committee, in August.

Senator Mead, as chairman, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], and the other Senators present had his testimony taken in detail. It was understood at that time that the investigation would proceed. One month later no steps had been taken.

The Senator from Maine urged and demanded that the matter should receive attention, and it was then agreed by all the members of the committee that the counsel should proceed to Germany to conduct the investigation, but the article contained no reference to and was based upon no knowledge secured by the counsel for the committee in his expedition to Germany. It was written long before the counsel had returned.

Mr. PEPPER. I am going to violate my agreement and take a moment more. The article continues:

> The reported conditions are so bad as to threaten defeat of the purpose of our occupation—the establishment of a peaceful self-government in Germany after the complete disarmament and denazification of that country. Our shoddy conduct is in sharp contrast to our lofty stated aims.

The officer's testimony was given to the committee in executive session on August 14. It was my understanding that a subcommittee would be sent to Germany without delay to make an investigation on the spot. That has been the uniform practice in such cases. But when I inquired about the progress of the case a month after the officer's testimony, I was surprised to learn from the committee's counsel that nothing would be done until after election.

It appeared that the Democratic majority on the committee, whose chairman at the time was Senator James M. Mead, of New York, had suppressed the information, whether for political or other reasons I do not know. In any event, it was not until Senator Mead resigned as chairman on September 26 that the committee began its investigation. Significantly, it is unlikely time will permit any results to be announced before election day.

I am speaking out now through Liberty magazine—

Which is not exactly an official publication of the Senate—

only because the American people are entitled to know the available facts at once. If only part of what the intelligence charges is true, our scandalous occupation of Germany reflects seriously upon the Truman administration.

I want to suggest that the old jewel of consistency, while it subjects one to certain criticisms on occasions, is certainly a precious inheritance, and I wish some of our friends and colleagues who are so apt to refer to our distinguished Chief Executive with such approval when they want his testimony, would always use him as their witness to corroborate good causes.

The truth when ascertained cannot but have serious repercussions on our foreign policy.

Furthermore, Mr. President, to show how far afield these investigators go, the article on page 68 states:

Part of the picture that is little known in this country concerns the conduct of Negro troops, who are reported to be more undisciplined and uncontrolled than the whites. A German bishop addressed a scathing letter to the American military government beseeching it to do something about its Negro soldiers.

What is the limit of an investigating committee, when it goes into everything including a comparison of our army with the Nazi army, the conduct of the Negro soldier of our service, and the foreign policy of the United States?

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I appreciate the publicity which the Senator from Florida is giving to an article which I wrote and sponsored. It was interesting to note the question as to the official character of the publication. It would appear to me that a publication of that character, reaching the American people and giving them the information expressed under oath by a colonel in the military intelligence, was fully as appropriate a forum as when the Senator from Florida, during one of the most critical stages of our negotiations with the Russians, appeared in Madison Square Garden and with his denunciations of the policies of the Truman administration invited the hisses of 20,000 so-called Americans in Madison Square Garden because of his characterization of the President of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER. In the first place, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine has now, and unmistakably, shown further how far afield he can readily and easily go when he desires to make a comparison between the Senator from Florida, who said what he did in his own right and upon his own individual and single responsibility in a public meeting purporting to represent nobody but himself, on a subject related to the peace or the war of this country, and the Senator from Maine, who reveals to the American people, through a magazine article, information which he has himself admitted he got in executive session of the War Investigating Committee, without ever disclosing the name of the author from whom he got the information, upon subjects with respect to which he purported to speak factually, whereas the Senator from Florida at Madison Square Garden spoke his opinion on a matter of public interest. I shall be glad to have a comparison made by the Senate or by the country or by history.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I gladly yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Maine assumed full responsibility for whatever was said in that article, designating very clearly the sources from which it was secured.

Mr. PEPPER. Anonymous.

Mr. BREWSTER. Wait a minute.

Mr. PEPPER. Did the Senator give the name of the officer?

Mr. BREWSTER. I gave the name of the source of the information.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes, the Senator quoted an author whose name he has never disclosed to the public, to my knowledge.

Mr. BREWSTER. It is now a name which is fully available to anyone who is interested; a responsible officer.

Mr. PEPPER. But the Senator did not tell the public that at the time he wrote the article.

Mr. BREWSTER. Let me finish. The information, as was stated clearly in the article, had been in the hands of the committee from August 15. It had been announced that the subject would be pursued, and it was not pursued, and finally, as the article stated, it became evident that it was determined that that information which was in the possession of the majority then in control, should not be permitted to be divulged to the American people until after they had made the solemn decision in the election as to whether or not the majority then in control of the Congress should be continued. The Senator from Maine is entirely willing to accept personal responsibility for that disclosure at that time, and under the circumstances, as he has stated, and believes that it was a public service of the first order to let the American people understand something of what were the methods being pursued by the majority of that committee in refusing to permit an investigation of that kind to go on.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; but the Senator from Maine did not tell the American people in the Liberty magazine article that he was quoting, without any authority from his committee, information which he obtained as a committee member, and that he was purporting to disclose, without authority of the committee, facts that they had from what, so far as the public knew, was an anonymous source. Mr. President, that is not the only time that something comparable to that has occurred.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield while I remind him that the 5 minutes have passed?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes. I desire to refer to one more article, and then I assure the Senator that I shall not yield to any one else, and I shall have concluded.

I have here what purports to be a release from the New York Times of October 28, 1946, which reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, October 27.—Senator OWEN BREWSTER, Republican, of Maine, made public tonight what he said was his copy of a long-suppressed report by the Senate War Investigating Committee asserting that the administration's war-housing operations failed miserably.

The copy released through the Republican National Committee was dated April 6, 1945.

Mr. President, it was a timely discovery that the committee had been dilatory in the publication of this report.

Mr. BREWSTER is a member of the investigating committee. Drafted by the committee's staff of experts, the report had this to say, among other things, about the housing program and how it was handled.

Mr. President, I shall not take the Senate's time now to discuss this phase of the matter, but I shall do so when we convene again.

I have a memorandum signed by Mr. Hugh Fulton, previously the counsel for the War Investigating Committee, telling about this report, by whom it was prepared, the circumstances of its preparation, and so forth, and then I also have a signed statement by Mr. Rudolph Halley, who at another time was the general counsel of the War Investigating Committee.

Yet, without knowledge, so far as this newspaper report discloses, of his colleagues on that committee, without any finding by a majority vote that anyone had suppressed a pertinent report, the Senator from Maine takes a staff report, his copy made available to him as a member of the committee, on the eve of the election—and all of us recall the big headlines that it got—and disclosed it to the American people. So, Mr. President, the inference is almost irrefutable that in the past there has been the widest latitude for these special investigating committees, and, in the second place, that there is evidence that they have also been used for political purposes and to achieve political objectives.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I told the majority leader that I would decline to yield to any Senator, but I will let the Senator from New Mexico proceed.

Mr. HATCH. There is just one question on the point the Senator was discussing. He said the report was released by the Senator from Maine. I got the impression from the article the Senator read that the report of this committee, or the supposed report, was released by the Republican National Committee.

Mr. PEPPER. Well, ex officio. It was by a member of the committee.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida, I understand, has yielded the floor for today. This discussion has now continued for three full legislative days, and I hope the time is coming, and that it is almost at hand, when we shall be ready to proceed to a disposition of the resolution. I am wondering, and I address my inquiry to the minority leader of the Senate, whether it is possible at this time to reach a unanimous-consent agreement as to a definite time for voting on Monday?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have consulted with the Senator from Maine, or he has consulted with me, about this matter, and I am agreeable to the suggestion of a suitable hour on Monday for a vote. As we have all seen, the discussion has gone along rather freely, and I am sure each Senator who has occupied the floor has probably occupied it longer than he intended, the result being that there are still three or four or perhaps five Senators within my knowledge who desire to make remarks, including the Senator from Kentucky, who will be brief, I assure the Senator from Maine. All of which leads me to the conclusion that we may not be able to agree on quite as early an hour as we discussed earlier in the day. I am prepared to suggest to the Senator from Maine that we agree to vote not later than 4 o'clock p. m. Monday on the pending resolution and also that on Monday, assuming that we recess until Monday, the time be divided equally between the proponents and the opponents of the proposition.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from Kentucky has said, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, before the Senator makes the request, I will allow the request to be made, and then, reserving the right to object, I should like to make an observation.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Monday, January 20, 1947, at not later than the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be proposed to Senate Resolution 46, continuing the authority for the investigation of the national-defense program, and upon the question of agreeing to the resolution itself.

I ask further, Mr. President, that the time between the convening of the Senate on Monday and the said hour of 4 o'clock fixed for voting, be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents of the resolution, the time to be controlled by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], and by the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. BARKLEY. By the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. WHITE. And by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, in the first place I would be agreeable if the Senator from Maine were to include in the request that the Senator from Florida may conclude his remarks. I should be willing to limit the time, but I should like to conclude my remarks when the Senate next assembles.

In the second place, I certainly think that 5 o'clock would be the earliest practicable time. I submit that thought to our able leader on this side of the aisle. He can use his own discretion about the other aspects, but I know that there are other Senators who contemplate speaking, and I wish to address myself to the subject a little further.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I assure the Senator from Maine that there is no disposition on the part of any Senator on this side of the aisle unduly to delay the vote. The request is for a vote at 4 o'clock It is obvious that after the vote is taken on the pending resolution we shall not be able to transact much other business during the day. Personally, I would be agreeable to any reasonable hour, but I suggested 4 o'clock. The first suggestion was 3 o'clock, but I could not agree to 3 o'clock under the circumstances I think 4 o'clock is a reasonable hour. I do not know how long the Senator from Florida desires to speak, but I think all Senators will recognize the fact that if we vote at 4 o'clock, that will leave less than 2 hours on either side. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON] desire to speak. I wish to make a brief statement. So we shall be crowded for time.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I should like to make an observation, which appears to me to relate to a matter of great importance. The discussion which arose a while ago about the meaning of the limitations in the present resolution was not satisfactory at all to me. I think there is quite a difference of opinion as to what the limitation proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] actually means. I think that question should be thoroughly debated, and we ought to know exactly what the limitations are to be on the new committee, if it is to be authorized.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico. In the 2 days that will elapse between now and the next session of the Senate, if better phraseology can be found to express what is clearly in the minds of Senators on both sides of the aisle, I am sure that it will be considered. The question had never been raised until the Senator from Texas raised it. The question was taken up with distinguished parliamentarians and litterateurs on this side of the aisle, and there seemed to be a consensus of opinion that the language meant exactly what it said, and was clear. But if the Senator from New Mexico can better phrase it, his suggestions will be welcome.

Mr. HATCH. There is not only that particular point; but there was the discussion between the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Florida as to expenditures, and qualifying words—whether they meant everything that was included. I recall that the Senator from Maine stated that that was a matter for each Senator to determine for himself. That could not possibly be. We must have a definite understanding and know what we are doing, because I am certain Senators are influenced by this limitation. We ought to know what it means. The debate may require some time.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I suggest, if possible, that the minority leader and the majority leader agree on the hour of 4 o'clock, not because there is any desire to shut off debate, but 1 hour will not make a great deal of difference in the debate on this issue. I am satisfied that ff the hour can be fixed at 4 o'clock it will be satisfactory to Senators with whom I have talked. I hope an agreement can be made on that basis. There is no inclination to shut off debate, but 1 hour will not make a great deal of difference in the debate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I have indicated, I am perfectly willing to agree to the hour of 4 o'clock, although I think that will cramp some of us who wish to discuss this subject, and who have not yet had an opportunity to do so. This is one of the most important problems that will confront this session of the Senate, because what we may do in this regard may set a precedent for what we may do in the future. There is no urgent business awaiting attention. That does not mean that we wish to delay the vote, but it is an argument in favor of giving Senators who wish to speak a reasonable time in which to express their views. I myself do not see much difference between 4 and 5 o'clock Monday, inasmuch as we shall probably not transact any other business on that day. I am still willing to agree to the hour of 4 o'clock if some other Senator does not object, even though I may be crowded out altogether.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to make my position clear for the RECORD.

The change in the alinement of the Senate from a Democratic to a Republican majority has in no way changed my view as to the soundness of the general policy of objecting to such unanimous-consent agreements as are requested this afternoon. However, I believe that each request should be considered on the basis of its individual merits, as I did in the closing months of the last session of the Seventy-ninth Congress.

I believe that this particular request is reasonable, because I think we have debated the pros and cons pretty well, provided that the majority leader can accept the suggestion that the hour be 5 o'clock. I believe that when one Member of the Senate asks that such an agreement be extended for only an hour, that is a perfectly reasonable request.

Let me say further, Mr. President, that I particularly do not like, as a matter of policy, unanimous-consent requests which propose that the time for debate on the floor of the United States Senate shall be placed at the disposal of particular leaders, or be made subject to parceling by any group of Senators or any two Senators. As a matter of general policy I shall object to any such infringement upon the rights of individual Senators, because I am well satisfied, on the basis of what has already happened in the Eightieth Congress, that those of us on this side of the aisle who represent certain minority points of view must at all times exercise the utmost caution in protecting ourselves from action which would make it impossible for us to enjoy our full rights on the floor of the Senate.

As a general policy I shall object to any unanimous-consent agreement which proposes to give to any leadership in the Senate the right to parcel out time unless we can have an agreement behind that agreement, that Senators representing minority points of view shall have a certain portion of the time satisfactory to the minority group.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Oregon that it is my understanding that he desires to speak on this measure. In the event that I have anything to do with the time, so far as I can control it he will not be slighted in the control of that time if he is unable to obtain from the other side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE]?

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I object to any unanimous-consent agreement tonight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I am happy to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, to the extent that I may be included in any unanimous-consent agreement, and to give my assurance to the Senator from Oregon that he will not be slighted in the division of time. I hope that nothing that he said was intended in any way to indicate any doubt as to the fairness of the Senator from Maine, because our relationships have always been most cordial.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, we are transacting most important business in the Senate, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum and also ask unanimous consent that further proceedings in connection with the roll call be suspended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I should like to make another effort to reach an agreement as to the time for voting on the resolution and amendments. My suggestion of 4 o'clock on Monday does not seem to have met with general favor. I ask, therefore, that from 2 o'clock on Wednesday the limitation suggested be enforced.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does that contemplate that all day Monday the debate will be free from restrictions?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest to the Senator that he include in his request that after the convening of the Senate on Wednesday until the vote at 2 o'clock, the time be divided equally among those opposed to and those favoring the resolution.

Mr. WHITE. I am very happy to include that as a part of my unanimous consent request.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, am I to understand that we are to vote promptly at 2 o'clock?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. LUCAS. Let us make it a definite hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that under the unanimous consent request all debate would stop at 2 o'clock, and then the Senate would proceed to vote upon the pending amendments without further debate.

Mr. BARKLEY. And that the time on Wednesday be divided between the two sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. From the time the Senate meets on Wednesday until 2 o'clock, the time is to be equally divided.

Mr. WHITE. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MARCUS GEORGE MEMORIAL HOSPITAL

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to report from the Finance Committee Senate bill 86, a bill to provide for designation of the United States Veterans' Administration Hospital at Americus, Ga., as the Marcus George Veterans' Memorial Hospital, and to submit a report (No. 6) thereon. I also request immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be received.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proposed United States Veterans' Administration hospital at Americus, Ga., shall be known and designated on the public records as the Marcus George Veterans' Memorial Hospital.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the Committee on Finance be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report (No. 6) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 86) to provide for designation of the proposed United States Veterans' Administration hospital at Americus, Ga., as the Marcus George Veterans' Memorial Hospital, having considered the same, reports favorably thereon without amendment and recommends that the bill do pass.

Place: Atlantic area.

Cause: Plane lost (enemy action).

According to the records on file Lieutenant George was listed on the records of the Navy Department in the status of missing in action as of August 7, 1943. He was on board a plane which took off from the Naval Air Station, New York, on an anti-submarine patrol flight. Several minutes after the plane took off, it was instructed by its base to proceed to position 37°35' North latitude and 71°20' West longitude, in order to investigate that area and to stand by a plane which had landed to pick up survivors of another plane which had been shot down by an enemy submarine. The last message received was an acknowledgement of the receipt of the above message. Weather conditions in the area at the time included excellent visibility and a calm sea with light swells. Extensive but unsuccessful search operations were conducted. Reports received state that the reason for the failure of the plane to return is unknown but its loss is believed to have been the result of enemy submarine gunfire.

The committee is in full accord with the purposes of the bill and recommends its enactment.

FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID TO STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to submit a resolution, and I wish to make a brief statement in explanation of it. I send it to the desk and ask unanimous consent that it may be received at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 61) was received and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as follows:

Resolved, That a duly appointed subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is hereby authorized and directed to—

(a) Make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to existing and proposed Federal grants to State and local governments for welfare, education, and health programs, and for other programs within the jurisdiction of such committee, the volume, types, purposes, and administration of such grants, and the standards and conditions applicable to such grants, with special emphasis upon the need for such improved legislative and administrative policies as will more effectively meet the needs for which such grants have been or may be authorized, eliminate duplication and inconsistencies, promote economy and efficiency, clarify the relationship between the Federal Government and States and local governments, help solve the problem of the development of underdeveloped regions, and contribute to the development and maintenance of sound fiscal policy;

(b) Consult, in the course of such study and investigation, with State and local governments, with such other legislative committees of the Senate as are directly concerned with Federal grants to State and local governments, with the Federal agencies administering such grants, and with such other agencies or persons as the committee or subcommittee may see fit to consult;

(c) Report to the Senate, from time to time, the results of its studies and investigations under this resolution, together with such proposed legislation and other recommendations as it may deem desirable.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the resolution which I have submitted provides that a subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be duly appointed to investigate Federal grants-in-aid to State and local governments. In my opinion the present situation in regard to Federal grants-in-aid to State and local governments is extremely chaotic. Over a period of years the Federal-aid-to-local-government program has been developed without any attempt to formulate a sound, coordinated program and policy. Some Federal grants merely substitute Federal funds for local funds, with a resulting apathy on the part of our State and local governments. Some programs provide the most money for the States which are less in need of the money. In general, the Federal-aid situation is a wild morass of red tape and administrative confusion.

Inasmuch as more than a billion dollars, which is a great deal of money, is involved in Federal grants to State and local governments, it is imperative that the Eightieth Congress make a careful review of this entire subject, particularly with respect to grants for heath, education, and public welfare. The chaotic situation in this field was recognized by the President of the United States in what I consider to be the very able Economic Report which he made to the Congress on January 8, 1947. In that report the President indicated that the Council of Economic Advisers would undertake a broad study of this question. On page 27 of the report we find the President using the following language:

> I have asked the Council of Economic Advisers to cooperate with the Bureau of the Budget and other Federal agencies concerned, and with State and local advisory committees, to undertake a study of Federal grants to State and local governments to determine to what extent revised standards for the distribution of these grants may take into account more fully the needs for support that exists in various parts of the country.

Mr. President, I think that is an excellent recommendation, and I believe that the resolution which I am submitting at this time seeks to implement and carry out that recommendation of the President. I think the issue is so clearly a nonpartisan one that by all means the recommendation should be implemented.

In fact, I think that as we face the fiscal problems of the Federal Government, the time has come when we need to find out, first, what amounts of money we are spending in the various agencies of Government, and, second, for what purpose we are spending it. I think that is a much sounder way to effectuate economy in government and to promote an efficient fiscal policy than it is to announce to the American people an across-the-board 20-percent reduction in income taxes, when we do not yet know, I submit, either within the Republican Party or within the party represented by the Senators across the aisle, exactly what all our money is being spent for or what economies can be brought about by such an investigation as the one I propose in the resolution I have submitted. I think this type of investigation should be conducted in a great many other segments of the executive branch of our Government.

I think it should be decided to what extent we wish to spend money and on what we wish to spend money, before we can determine where we can save money and how much money we can save in the executive departments. I think it is necessary to do that before we can determine what services we can dispense with. I think it is a form of deception to lead the American people to believe that we can have an across-the-board percentage tax cut without first telling them specifically the effect of that tax cut upon the services now being rendered. We wish to find out first what the American people need, insofar as Government service is concerned, before we follow that type of policy.

So, Mr. President, I say that it seems to me this is a matter of such great importance that we should not leave it to the executive branch of the Government. Congress has the prime responsibility of appropriating funds. Therefore, it must be the responsibility of Congress, as well as of the Council of Economic Advisers, to undertake this type of study.

The resolution is thoroughly consistent with the principles of the Reorganization Act. Instead of proposing the appointment of a special committee to study the question, it delegates the problem to a subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the standing legislative committee which has legislative interest in the majority of Federal-aid programs.

Incidentally, Mr. President, let me say that in the Seventy-ninth Congress I submitted a similar resolution. I succeeded in having it reported by the Committee on Education and Labor by the unanimous vote of that committee. Unfortunately, I was unable to convince the Republican members of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate that they should support the resolution. The Democratic chairman of that committee, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], had notified me that if the Republican members of the committee would approve the resolution the Democrats on the committee, who at that time were in the majority, would not object to its adoption.

In view of the failure of the Republican members of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to cooperate in this matter at the last session of Congress, I think that now that we on the Republican side of the aisle are in the majority we should go forward with the resolution and should proceed to carry it to adoption. Unfortunately, for reasons of their own, it was the Republicans who prevented the adoption of that resolution in the Seventy-ninth Congress, at a time when the Democrats were in the majority in this body.

So, Mr. President, if what we really wish to do is to inform the American people and ourselves what are the facts in regard to an expenditure of more than a billion dollars in Federal grants-in-aid, I think this resolution should be adopted at a very early date, so that we can proceed with the investigation before we reach final decisions as to what should be our fiscal policy in the Eightieth Congress.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I wish to move an executive session.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 20, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 15, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God, we remember Thy promise that wheresoever two or three are gathered together in Thy name, there Thou art in the midst of them. We claim that promise this morning, and pray that each one of us may be aware of Thy presence, for Thou knowest our needs, and how inadequate we feel ourselves to be in the presence of world problems and the challenges of this hour. If Thou wilt help us, O Lord, then shall we be better than we are, wiser than we know, and stronger than we dream.

In this prayer, we bring unto Thee the Members of this body, its officers and its servants, for Thy blessing; men who feel the weight of responsibility and the need of divine guidance; men who are often sorely tempted and who need the support of Thy grace. Bestow upon them the courage to do the right as Thou hast given them to see the right, and make it clear unto us all, for Jesus sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 17, 1947, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.
